BOTANISTS WILL BE GLAD TO LEARN the existence of a rare flower on Hampstead Heath. The Hampstead and Highgate Express states that the Heath still possesses a curious flower which has not been recorded there, nor indeed anywhere else that we are aware of, for nearly three centuries. John Gerarde published at London in 1597, "The Herball, or General Historie of Plantes," and therein, speaking of betony (stachys betonica), he alludes to having found a white-flowered plant "in a wood at Hamsteede, near Master Wade's house." This pretty flower, now to be seen plentifully in West Heath, is universally a deep red purple. It is also interesting to notice that Gerarde must have found the white-flowered variety on land now built over, for Master Wade, or Sir William Wade, Lieutenant of the Tower and Clerk of the Council, lived in Belsize House then. Three more white-flowered plants have recently been found in the middle of West Heath by Mr. H. Epps, who forwarded one as a curiosity to the Royal Kew Gardens, which has been acknowledged with thanks by the assistant-curator, Professor W. T. Thiselton Dyer, author of "Flora of Middlesex."

GOLD SWEEPINGS FROM THE FLOOR OF THE MINT form a considerable item in the returns of that institution, but across the Atlantic the economising of the precious metal is carried on still further, and we learn from the Philadelphia Bulletin that the dust which has been allowed to accumulate upon the roof of the Philadelphia Mint during the past twenty-five years was collected recently, by order of Governor Pollock, for the purpose of ascertaining what proportion of metal it contained. The roof is of asphalt, and, as it softens, the dust sticks to it tenaciously. Some amount of difficulty was subsequently experienced in removing it, but finally a quantity amounting to 1,732 pounds in weight was removed. This has just been submitted to the usual assaying process, and the result shows that 42 ounces of standard gold and 96½ ounces of standard silver—a total valuation of about 170*l.*—had been conveyed in the upward flight of the smoke of the chimney to the place where it became located for a season. A similar experiment was tried a quarter of a century ago, and out of 3·80 ounces of dust an ounce of gold was extracted, which is now exhibited as a curiosity in the office of the assayer. The floors of the Mint are swept every week and the accumulation preserved, and once a year the woodwork of the refining-room and the gloves of the employés are burned and the precious dust obtained from them, while the residue is sold to sweep-smelters.

WAR CORRESPONDENTS

THE group of portraits which we are enabled to-day to present to our readers of the Special Correspondents who are now engaged in the arduous duty of collecting and transmitting intelligence from the seat of war may be said to represent the latest and most important development of newspaper enterprise. Special correspondence is really but a thing of yesterday. Middle-aged newspaper readers may well remember the time when as yet no English journal thought it worth while to exert itself energetically in the way of obtaining articles descriptive of important events from the pens of contributors specially engaged for the purpose. There was often, it is true, a spirited competition in the matter of rapid transmission of news. If there was a great political gathering, for example, at Bristol or at Liverpool, it was thought desirable at any expense to transmit the short-hand-writer's' report by means of relays of light gigs, provided if possible with faster horses than any rival journal had been able to secure. If we remember rightly "Our Own Correspondent" first appeared in the shape of "Our Special Commissioner," who, though he was pretty nearly identical in his functions, nevertheless conveyed both to the journalistic and the public mind a somewhat different idea. He was supposed to be a person of calm judgment and special knowledge, who had been retained by the newspaper he represented for the purpose of inquiring in a semi-judicial way into some matter of great public interest concerning which it had been found difficult to arrive at trustworthy conclusions. The causes, the nature, and the actual extent of the famine in Ireland consequent on the failure of the potato crop in 1846-7, the condition of the London poor and their alleged sufferings from the sudden introduction of Free Trade, are among the subjects which in this way were elaborately examined and reported upon on behalf of particular journals. Nowadays, however, "Special Commissioner" is a term almost unknown. "Our Own Correspondent" has absorbed his duties in much more comprehensive functions. Instead of being a mere casual and accidental person, he is a permanent feature—perhaps the most important of all features—of English journalism. This fact is never more apparent than during the progress of a great war like that which is now taxing all the energies and resources of the Turkish and the Russian Governments.

The War Correspondent naturally dates from the period of the Crimean War, the first great military contest in which England had been engaged since Waterloo. How deep an impression was created by the brilliant descriptive articles of Dr. Russell, whom our contemporary, The Times, had, with characteristic energy, engaged to accompany the expedition even from our shores, is well known. The Indian Mutiny and the Civil War in America gave a further development to this system, but it was not until the great war between France and Germany that the War Correspondent became the all-important personage which in time of war he is now universally felt to be. A writer who would draw a portrait of a typical War Correspondent after the manner of La Bruyère or Sir Thomas Overbury would have to attribute to him no inconsiderable number of qualifications. He must, in the first place, be healthy and vigorous, and capable of bearing fatigue and privation to a degree which few persons are equal to; he should be active and self-denying; he should ride well and speak languages; he should be imposing enough in appearance to inspire respect in a cut-throat Bashi-Bazouk or a marauding Cossack. It is needless to say that he should be a person of strong nerves, and not habitually over-anxious for his personal safety. Military knowledge and experience are absolutely essential, and these not only in regard to details, for he must be capable of readily understanding and appreciating the significance and importance of combined movements and of strategy in general. But all these qualities would, of course, avail nothing if he was wanting in the literary art which enables a writer to portray what he has seen effectively. Lastly, if he represents a journal like The Graphic, he must not only have the artist's eye for a picture, but the artistic skill necessary for taking a rapid sketch under conditions not often favourable for the exercise of his powers.

The great fact of war correspondence in these days is the transmission of letters by the electric telegraph. If we remember rightly, it was our contemporary the Daily News that first set the example of transmitting, not a mere brief summary, but an entire article descriptive of some great military event by means of the electric wires. The occasion was the fall of Metz, the story of which, occupying a column and a half, appeared to the surprise of the public on the very morning after the surrender. From that day newspapers, in time of a war which predominates over all other topics of interest, may be said to have lived by "the wires" alone. Long special letters from the seat of war, it is true, do make their appearance daily; but it is the great object of newspaper enterprise to outstrip the lagging post, and, with the first intimation of a good battle, to publish a full description and decisive comment on' the result. The credit of the most surprising feat in this way yet accomplished is unquestionably due to Mr. Archibald Forbes, the famous correspondent of the Daily News, whose brilliant description of the battle before Plevna and the disastrous retreat of the Russian army, occupying five and a quarter newspaper columns, and comprising 6,200 words, was in most part actually written in the telegraph office while the entire narrative was in the course of transmission. It must not, however be supposed that the war correspondent's duties consist only in seeing battles and writing about them. With him the great question is, "Where can I go with a reasonable hope of finding the telegraph officials disengaged, and willing to transmit a message of such an extraordinary kind?"—a question necessarily shifting as the scene of battle changes. In some instances he may get assistance from couriers; but more often he must ride himself—day and night, if necessary—to some place in neutral territory, where he hopes he will neither be harassed by official scruples about disseminating unpleasant tidings, nor impeded by the hurry and confusion which always prevail in telegraph offices in the vicinity of important military operations. Piteous descriptions of the trammels under which our newspaper correspondents with the Turkish armies are compelled to discharge their duties have recently been published. To the credit of the Russian Commanders, it should be mentioned that they have shown themselves less afraid of disagreeable truths. A striking example of this is the fact that, so far from taking offence at Mr. Forbes' terribly picturesque narrative of their sufferings and humiliations in the disastrous struggles before Plevna, it has been officially intimated by the Russian Commander-in-Chief that orders have been sent from head-quarters to all the official newspapers in Russia that, pending the issue of the formal Government report, a full translation of Mr. Forbes's telegram is to be accepted by them, and represented as substantially accurate both as regards the details and the result of the conflict. Mr. Forbes has borne full testimony to the privation and the dangers encountered by our artist, Mr. Villiers, who, as our readers are well aware, has been present with him at all these great battles. Of the fruits of Mr. Villiers's energy and talent it would not become us to speak further.

On the whole, it would seem that the business of supplying the public with early and authentic descriptions and pictures from the seat of war could hardly by possibility be carried to any higher point of development. That these improvements in the details of journalism are terribly costly may easily be inferred. The consumption of valuable horses alone is often no inconsiderable item in a war correspondent's expenses; but perhaps the chief torment of a responsible manager of a daily journal in war time is the certainty that no precautions consistent with that bold expenditure, which is the condition of ultimate success, will protect him from a considerable proportion of what may be called abortive enterprises. Postal and telegraphic disorganisation, or impediments placed in the way by military or official authorities, count for much; but to these causes must be added the uncertainty which always prevails as to the exact points of future operations. The present war in Armenia has probably entailed an expense on our papers in this way altogether out of proportion to the letters and telegrams which have appeared. It is worth noting that American journals are making but little effort in connection with the present war, which may hence be inferred to possess only a comparatively small interest for their readers. German and French journals, on the other hand, have bestirred themselves in an unusual degree; but we may fairly say that on this, as on most other occasions, English journalism occupies the foremost rank.

THE READER

UNDER the title of "The Khedive's Egypt" (S. Low and Co.), Mr. Edwin de Leon has given us a new Egyptian volume, less encyclopædic than Mr. M'Coan's recent work, but not on that account less generally readable. An ex-Consul-General for the United States, Mr. de Leon lived behind the scenes in Egypt during the rule of three successive Viceroys. He has known alike the old French generals of Mehemet Ali and the new American officers of the Khedive. He can describe Cairo as it was when the blank walls of the old Eastern houses pressed in upon the trees of the Ezbekieh, and as it is with a modern quarter all boulevards and Paris shops. He can speak from personal knowledge, amounting often to intimacy, of all the members of Mehemet Ali's able but somewhat unlucky race—of the half-savage unimproving Abbas; of M. de Lessep's patron, the frank and generous Said; of his brother Halim, the strong swimmer, who alone escaped when the railway train with its freight of princes went down into the Nile, and who vegetates now at Constantinople, with a claim to the reversion of Egypt only waiting an opportunity to be pressed; of the Khedive himself, in his days of glory and his days of debt, and of the Khedive's Ministers, from the late Mouffetich to the stern and honest Nubar. It is, in fact, this personal knowledge, spiced, as it often is, with ready anecdote and occasional glimpses of the death in the height of power which even the nineteenth century has not quite wiped out from among the possibilities of an Eastern statesman's career, and setting before us, as it always does, the leading men of modern Egypt with the distinctness of fellow guests at a table d'hôte, that gives much of Mr. de Leon's work its greatest charm. Of the Khedive himself, for all his extravagance, Mr. de Leon writes on the whole most favourably, though unlike Mr. M'Coan, he prefers to look upon him not as the absolute ruler but as a sovereign caught hand and foot in the net that he has twined and with "the control of finance, railway, docks, and harbours, in fact, of everything but the army, as well as the great products of the soil," passing away into foreign hands. Space forbids us to follow out the condensed but admirably lucid chapters on this great question of foreign control, of the new masters in "the old house of bondage," too much disposed just now to press hardly for the letter of their bond and to burden an exhausted country with troops of highly-paid officials—six men to do the work of one; on the future of the Canal and the true meaning of "neutralisation;" and on the mixed tribunals now in the third year of their probationary "quinquennate," through whose agency Nubar Pasha planned to introduce into Egypt the "reign of law." As little can we linger on the excellent sketch of Gordon Pasha—why will Americans describe him as the "comrade" of Ward and Burgevine?—or of the good to come in no very distant future from the annexations in the Soudan. With generous patience on the part of foreign creditors, yet no relaxation of the pressure that has already, in Mr. de Leon's eyes, broken the power of vice-regal absolutism, our author predicts a future for the country which should gladden the heart of weary bondholders, possibly even the realisation in the end of Mehemet Ali's great dream of an Arab Empire of Egypt, Syria, and the Peninsula, and that under the protection of the very Powers who in 1840 baffled the design.

Not all our readers, we suspect, know much of the subject of the memoir, "Augustin Cochin, by the Count de Falloux" (Chapman and Hall)—a neat translation of which now lies before us from the pen of Mr. Aug. Craven—nor can we confidently aver that its perusal will much increase their interest in his story. For M. Cochin was of that feeble folk the Liberal Catholics, who clustered round Montalembert, Gratry, Lacordaire, &c., and whose vibration to and fro between "the right of self-defence and the duty of submission" did but bring on them scorn from extremer Catholics like Veuillot, and suspicion from otherwise not unfriendly Liberals. Nor even among this little group does M. Cochin—for all his virtues, and his influence as conductor of their special organ, Le Correspondant—present the appearance of a very burning and shining light. Most estimable in private life, in public life of the official rather than of the statesman type, his best admirers would hardly rank him among those who help to make or to avert revolutions. As a private gentleman, as an responsible official, he deserves all the praise that a strict sense of duty, a lifetime given to charity and good works, to the cause of religious education and the improvement of the industrial classes, can possibly entail. As the young mayor of the Tenth Arrondissement he sheltered the remnant of the National Assembly in their last protest against the coup d'état. As one of the Commission of Public Instruction it was he who gave M. de Falloux the greatest help in carrying through the Law of March, 1850. As director of the Orleans Railway Company, as an active promoter of the great Industrial Exhibitions of 1855 and 1867, as the author of an admirable brochure on slavery, he became known to social and economic reformers beyond the limits of his own land. To the esteem inspired by him in the first-mentioned of these offices he owed his escape, through timely warning from a workman when already marked out as a hostage by the leaders of the Commune. His last act was a letter to M. Thiers imploring him to lead France back to Monarchy. Altogether, a good, precise, and honourable life, but one whose interest for the general reader is chiefly in so far as it is typical of many who are ranged just now behind a De Broglie and a Dupanloup.

There is something a little suspicious about "Fatal Days; or, An Amateur's Notes on France, Europe, and the 16th of May" (W. Mullan and Sons), addressed ostensibly to an English friend by M. de la Frauche-Comté. Certes, the letters are curiously English, and run in English grooves of thought. For the rest there is not much that is very remarkable about them. Doubtless the missive of the 16th of May was a coup of the Clerical reaction which uses MacMahon as its very stupid and therefore very trustworthy avant garde. Quite possibly, too, there are dreams in Ultramontane circles of dragging all Europe into two adverse camps—the "Church" in their own language and the "World." Second childhood, like first, must have its toys. But there is little good in speculations which ignore the sober via media of Teutonic races, and forget events which have changed the balance of power, and made the course of politics in France a matter chiefly of interest to France's self.

A darkly interesting episode of other days is told at large in a new edition of the "Witches of Renfrew" (A. Gairdner, Paisley), one of the last (not the last) causes célèbres in the annals of witch persecution in the North—the supposed bewitchment of the hysterical or deceitful daughter of the Laird of Bargarren, for which two men and four women were burnt at the stake on the Gallow-Green of Paisley, June 10th, 1697, and one man committed suicide in prison. Depouent sayeth not whether Christine Shaw, who grew up into a strapping girl, married a minister, and introduced into Paisley the manufacture of linen thread, still one of its chief staples, had any subsequent tinges of remorse. She died probably long before elders and ministers of the Kirk had ceased to groan over the repeal of the "Acts Anentis Witchcraft," by an Erastian and unbelieving House of Legislature.

Antiquaries will feel a debt of gratitude to Dr. Charles Rogers, of the Royal Historical Society for his very interesting "Genealogical Memoirs of the Scotts and the Haliburtons," the latter a reprint of the rare pamphlet printed for private circulation in '24 by the great Sir Walter, the last representative save one of the old Lowland line of Haliburtons—the former an account from Dr. Roger's own pen of the direct ancestry of the novelist, fully justifying his well-known desire to become the founder at Abbotsford of "a distinct branch of the House of Scott." Both memoirs furnish more than one curious detail of life on the Borders in the olden time.

A little preface by Dean Stanley adds value to "A Layman's Legacy in Prose and Verse" (Macmillan and Co.), or "Selections, with a Memoir, from the Papers of the late Samuel Greg," the brother of "W. R. G." of literary fame. A more sensitive and tender spirit, we should guess, than the Cassandra of our social polities—a hero-worshipper "whose swans were" oftentimes "all geese"—a lover of the working classes who found his model villagers could strike like any other men when he introduced new machinery—in later years a prey to ill-health and disappointment, Mr. Greg's was clearly one of those "hidden lives" which those love best who know them best. His papers—short poems or lay sermons—are often pretty, and sometimes not without power. Still their chief worth is for those who will value them in memoriam.

It has been often enough remarked that many words and phrases quoted as Scripture are not to be found there at all, but prove on inquiry to be nothing more than exaggerations of some ancient gloss or paraphrase. In "Scripture Difficulties Explained by Scripture References" (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.) Mr. T. Spalding avails himself of this fact to explain and illustrate a number of anthropomorphic expressions, symbolic phrases, idioms, and so forth, that have sometimes caused no slight perplexity to Bible students. The volume is very plainly written, and excellently suited for the less learned reader.

We know not whether M. Louis Mercier's "Le Deuil" (P. Douset), dedicated to Mr. W. C. Jay, partakes at all of the nature of the reclame. In any case, it is a very prettily got up and interesting little volume, which we can quite commend to any reader who would like to know the hue, the fashion, and the duration of mourning apparel literally from China to Peru, and from the earliest ages to our own.

The recent Christ's Hospital controversy has brought into print a shoal of Old Blues anxious to record their experiences. "Annals of Christ's Hospital," by a Blue (Smart and Allen), sketches the rise of the ancient church and monastery of the Franciscans or Grey Friars, its decay, the subsequent gift of the buildings to the City by Henry VIII., and the foundation there of the Blue Coat School by pious Edward VI., inspired by Bishop Ridley's sermon on charity. The history of the school is brought down to the present time, the system of government described, and brief biographies are added of eminent scholars.—"Eight Years a Blue Coat Boy" (Dean and Son) is less historical, and details the inner life of the schoolboys, the author's experience evidently having been a happy one.—Lastly, Mr. W. H. Blanch's "The Blue Coat Boys" (E. W. Allen) deals alike with the history of the foundation and with the school-life. Mr. Blanch does not gloss over the troubles of the lads, and relates stories of manifold floggings, but he speaks of the food as fairly good, and the treatment in general as kind, while he is careful to present a frontispiece of the respective Christ's Hospital and Eton rods, showing the former to be much shorter and lighter than the latter. The chapter on peculiar bequests and the vocabulary of school-slang are most amusing, and the whole volume, enlivened with plentiful anecdotes, will be read with much interest.—Another charitable foundation, "Dulwich College" (E. W. Allen), has been studied by the same author with no less care, and if the South London college does not possess quite as much interest for the general public as the City school, yet many may like to learn the circumstances of its formation, and some particulars of its founder from the present succinct history.

"The Boudoir Shakespeare," edited by H. Cundell (Sampson Low and Co.), which is especially compiled for reading aloud, has reached its third volume, containing Romeo and Juliet, Twelfth Night, and King John. In this edition all objectionable matter is omitted and no notes are given, but in many cases the omissions seriously injure the sense and rhythm of the poetry.—Anent the Elizabethan era, a carefully written "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh," by Louise Creighton (Rivingtons), forms another of the useful series of historical biographies, edited by the Rev. M. Creighton. Miss Creighton has consulted well-chosen authorities, and has produced a plain unvarnished narrative, suitable alike for the schoolroom and the biographical student.—The glorious deeds of more English heroes are chronicled in "The Victoria Cross in the Crimea," by Major Knollys (Dean and Son), which is to be followed by the "Victoria Cross in India and the Colonies."—The exploits of the "Obstructives" give fresh interest to a reprint of "Barney Geoghegan, M.P." (W. Mullan), Mr. Edward Jenkins' humorous satire on Home Rule in St. Stephen's, while Paddy at home is briefly illustrated in "A Rollicking Irish Tour" (A. Gardner), by A.R.A.—short sketches of the adventures of three Scotchmen in the Emerald Isle.

THE SESSION OF 1877 & THE OBSTRUCTIVES

The Session of Parliament which closed last week earned for itself a place in history which is probably unique. We have had boisterous Sessions before, and they have been referred to a good deal in the course of the past few months. It has been urged, not without truth, that Mr. Parnell and his colleagues were not the inventors of obstruction. As there were brave men before Agamemnon, so there were obstructives before Mr. Biggar. In fact if we come to look back over the records we shall find that obstruction has always formed rather a leading power in our constitutional history. During the debates on the Reform Bill of 1832, obstruction played a prominent and recognised part. The Obstructives were led by no less a personage than an ex-Attorney-General, and an elaborate scheme was formed by which the hard work was equally divided among a good number of members eager to distinguish themselves and serve their country. Even what has been regarded as the modern system of "relays" is not new. There were relays—at least of the speakers—during the Reform debates, and an attempt was distinctly and deliberately made so far to prolong the controversy that the passing of the Bill might be delayed by a Session.

Later still, within the memory of many members of the House, obstruction formed a part of business of Parliament of which Ministers had ultimately to take account. All Mr. Gladstone's great measures were obstructed, much on the general principle upon which the Irishmen have proceeded throughout this Session. Two of the most famous and successful obstructives of the last Parliament now sit on the Treasury Bench, one having under his control the important affairs of the British Colonies. According to a House of Commons joke this great fact is acknowledged by the gentlemen immediately concerned, and it is stated that Mr. Lowther, shaking hands with Mr. Cavendish Bentinck on the day of the prorogation, gave utterance to his profound regret that "the holy cause of obstruction" should have been defiled by falling into the hands of men of the stamp of Mr. Biggar and Mr. O'Donnell. The Irish Land Act, and more particularly the Irish Church Act, were obstructed at every turn, Mr. Lowther rising from a place in the close vicinity of that now occupied by Mr. O'Donnell, and moving, with an imperturbability that Mr. O'Donnell cannot excel, the adjournment of the House or the reporting of progress.

But where the Irish members have succeeded in establishing a direct point of difference between their obstruction and all that has gone before lies in the fact of their perfect impartiality of criticism—their Catholicity of objection. They have objected to everything, not because they were able to criticise any particular measure, but because it was a measure, and had been proposed by some hon. member. A memorable instance of this broad view of things was supplied when Mr. Biggar undertook to obtain the rejection of Mr. Chaplin's Threshing Machines Bill. Mr. Biggar knew nothing about the Bill, and when asked on a subsequent occasion why he should have opposed it, frankly answered, "Well, to tell the truth, I can't bear that there Chaplin." Here at least was a reason, which, if scarcely adequate to the occasion, was not without its measure of sufficiency. But in many other cases there was lacking even this explanation of why objection should be taken to Bills, and it was too evident that the only principle upon which the hon. members acted was that they took the Order Book, read down the list of Bills, and then proceeded to write out opposite to each the formal notice of rejection.

The practical consequence of this frame of mind on the part of a few men inassailable by the ordinary influences which, as Mr. Chaplin perilously said a few weeks ago, guide gentlemen in the House of Commons, has been to render the Session comparatively barren. An avowed object with which the Obstructives acted was in defence of the rights of private members. There seems something nationally characteristic in the fact that one result of their action has been that private members have suffered more seriously than any one else concerned. In no previous Session have Bills brought forward by private members been so ruthlessly smothered. According to the course of business in the House, private members who do not aim at ambitious legislation, but are content to do good upon homœopathic principles, succeed in getting the consent of Parliament to their proposals at a late hour of the sitting, when the main business has been disposed of. Messrs. Biggar and Parnell objecting, and very properly, to the principle of carrying on the business of the nation at an hour when sensible men ought to be in bed, attacked wholesale notices of rejection to the Bills they found on the paper. The first result of this action was that these Bills might not be proceeded with after half-past twelve at night, and consequently they lost their only chance of becoming law. As to the operation of this Parliamentary Colorado beetle upon Ministerial legislation, it has been recorded from week to week in this column. Looking back over the Session, the mind is forced to the conclusion that it has been one neither useful to the country, favourable to private reputation, nor calculated to uphold the historic dignity of the House of Commons.

THE SUSSEX DOWNS

The South Downs, which commence majestically at Beachy Head, with the two depressions of the valleys of the Arun and Adour, stretch away some sixty miles through Sussex into Hampshire. One week in the year, at the time of the great Goodwood gathering, the London people learn something of the elastic turf and bracing air of the Downs. All through the year they form a favourite resort for Brighton and the numerous watering places that dot the Southern coast. Sometimes they approach the coast in steep seaward cliffs; at other times they retire inland, and their pastures descend somewhat abruptly into the broad, rich, cultivated weald. Any one who desires to obtain the full value of a change to the South Coast should make himself acquainted with those two great inspirers of health and spirits, the mountains and the sea. It is to be regretted that from an immense number of residents and visitors only a small minority are really free of the hills and waters. For these Downs form in reality a mountain range. Like all mountain ranges of the chalk formation they have a peculiar character. They are barren, treeless, somewhat monotonous, and where their rounded summits are crowned with groups of trees, as at Chanctonbury Ring, these are more or less modern plantations. There are still earthworks which indicate that our Druid ancestors found here places of habitation, sepulture, and worship. Going back still further in imagination, we may conceive these heights as islands in a vast lake or morass. They even now form one of the most solitary regions in England, although in many directions cultivation is gradually climbing the slopes. But if a man is really a lover of Nature, really a lover of solitude, the Downs become almost an enchanted region. Mr. Blackmore has happily made the country side the scene of one of his latest tales, and the poet Southey, in a well-known eloquent passage, has given his attestation to the impressive character of the scenery.

There is a considerable difference whether we approach the Downs on the northern or southern side. On the north side the descent is abrupt and steep, but on the south, unless they become sea-cliffs, the Downs are imperceptibly lost among the lowlands of the coast. It is on the north side we obtain in perfection the curves, undulations, deep descents, the long serpentine lines, the rapid gradations of colour, the masses of fleeting shadow. The shadows of the clouds, driven by the winds, mark with well-defined outlines the inequalities of their surface, 'now clothed in sober greys, now dazzling the eye by their brilliant coating of yellow charlock or kilk, or by the more subdued richness of the crimson clover field; alternately lighting up the grassy depths and scarped sides of their coombes, then sleeping there in purple gloom.' It is when you have gained the heights that you obtain fresh draughts of the invigorating air which is the very champagne of airs. The Brighton doctors tell their patients that they can never have too much of it. If they will only canter on these dry bracing Downs there is nothing which they may not eat and drink. The turf rebounds beneath the horses' hoofs, that turf which once removed never grows again. The views obtained are very noble. You cannot always see the Channel, but generally you do, with the martello towers, the coastguard houses with their flagstaffs, and afar the sailing vessels like sea-birds glimmering over the glossy sea. Near at hand you will see parties of excursionists wending their way past the rustling cornfields and barley-fields in the cool of the evening to inspect some old Roman camp or to gain some famous view. The inland view is as interesting as the seascape. The Downs are at times some six or seven miles in breadth, and they abound in subjects of interest which grow still more interesting the longer they are observed. The turf below you is interspersed with aromatic plants, wild thyme and clover, which are supposed to impart a flavour to the herbage, and afterwards a flavour to the mutton. It is a tremendous thought that there are, speaking roughly, about a quarter of a million of sheep on the hills. Lately there has been an appalling heresy to the effect that there is even better mutton to be got than the Southdown. All judicious feeders will, however, agree that the Southdown mutton is most excellent in its way. The sheep give quite a peculiar character to the landscape. You will see large flocks cropping the herbage, followed by their shepherd. These shepherds are a kindly simple folk, they have hard times in winter and bad weather, and it is always kind to give them a kindly greeting. Many of them have followed this pursuit a whole lifetime; you will find the shepherd boy who reminds himself how David fed the flock, and the grey-bearded sire who has spent all his monotonous life out on the hills, and has little consolation beyond the good Book. On the summit of the Downs you will often find round ponds lined with clay to catch the showers, and even in the hottest weather these seldom fail. It is curious to see how these ponds, at a great elevation, and distant from other ponds, abound with fresh-water plants and shell-fish, with frogs and lizards. If you have ornithological tastes the Downs will prove especially interesting. It will be very interesting to examine the collection of birds which has been formed by an enthusiastic sportsman on the Dyke Road near Brighton, and is to be open all the summer, and the proceeds given away in charity. By the way, Brighton has a peculiar attraction for birds. There are three miles of gas lamps there, and the poor creatures often dash themselves against the glass, and in this way many rare birds are taken in the squares and on the cliffs. Immense flocks of migratory birds assemble on the Downs in their season. The toothsome wheatear abound here, at one time in great quantities, and could be obtained at absurdly low prices. Every shepherd lad knew how to set a trap for wheatear in the turf. The different varieties of the plover abound. On the south of the Downs the little Italian beccaficos visit the fig gardens near Worthing for a few weeks of the summer. On the northern side you soon come down to the exquisite woodlands and to the old-world Sussex villages. These villages are often in the hollow valleys which run up amid the Downs. You see the sparse farmsteads, tiled and slated piles of red brick, with bulging barns and mighty ricks setting on props a foot or two high to avoid the rats, the old draw-well with windlass and bucket, pigs and poultry in abundance. Close by are the spacious vicarage, the village post-office, and the Sussex churches with their unmistakeable physiognomy, grey, square, with a kind of box-like turret. If you know much of the village life of the Down country you will see that it is not without reason that the county of Sussex is called the Bœotia of England. And yet it was from the yeomen of Sussex that Richard Cobden came. The geologist will be interested in knowing that while the Downs are chalk and the Weald is clay, near Hurstpierpoint, just where the big school appears as at Oxford or Cambridge College, set down within the shadow of the Downs, there is the greensand, such as that for which the London brewers have been seeking in vain. But the Downs are tapped in many directions, and furnish delicious water for all the country round, except in some villages where the landlord will not be at the expense of taking it into cottages, and consequently, in a very land of Beulah, in consequence of a want of good water typhus and typhoid make their ugly inroads.

Then in talking about the Sussex Downs it is as well perhaps to individualise a few localities. All the Brighton people go to the Dyke, where there is a little inn, which, in the nature of things, by this time should have given way to a large Limited Liability Hotel; with the quaint village of Poynings just below, and near Worthing there is the Miller's Tomb, with a still humbler hostelry. Then great houses are hidden away by the Downs. There are noble downs in the park of Arundel Castle, and at Goodwood, where there are cedars more plentiful than at Lebanon itself, and the great houses of Petworth and Parham are to be seen, Petworth especially, with its wealth of Turners, and, as most of these Turners are painted on drawing room panels, they are to be seen at Petworth, and at Petworth only. But though you may diverge to see the great houses, keep to your rambles upon the great Downs themselves, for elsewhere there is no such exhilarating air, no such lights and shadows, no such solitude and peace. Make a point of scaling the chief heights; Ditchling Beacon is the highest, and then, I think, Chanctonbury Ring or Telescombe Tye. As your eye takes in the white lines of roads your companion, if hostile to the rail, may tell you strange stories of highwaymen, and robbers, and smugglers in the days when the London Road crested these heights. And you may be reminded, as he runs pleasantly down, lately how George Eliot speaks of "the lofty curves of the chalk downs, grand, steadfast forms, played over by the changing days," and how Charles Kingsley delighted in "these mighty Downs, with their enormous sheets of spotless turf, where the dizzy eyes lose all standard of size and distance, before the awful simplicity, the delicate vastness, of these grand curves and swells . . . . the labyrinthine bosoms of the hills."

A FLIGHT OF "FANCY"

As long ago as Christmas last there might have been seen, exhibited in the window of a tavern in the unfashionable neighbourhood of the leather market at Bermondsey, an attractive placard, headed in large type, "A Rare Treat for Lovers of the Fancy!" and further setting forth that on a certain Monday in the forthcoming August there would be decided on the premises a Grand Sweepstakes Pigeon Race, open to all who were willing to conform to the rules, the most prominent of which was that for five months all members should subscribe the sum of one shilling a week. From the enthusiastic remarks of two young young fellows who were spelling out the announcement, and who evidently were authorities on the subject, it was thought worth while to make a note of the date, with a view if possible of being present when the great event was consummated.

Not much difficulty was experienced in rediscovering the place after an interval of seven months. Only for the absence of engines one might have thought that the tavern was on fire. The pavement was thronged, there was a mob in the road, while high up on the roof, amongst the chimney-pots, were many coatless, hatless men and lads nimbly coming and going and gesticulating excitedly. Within the house the crowd was denser than without. The bar space, the passages, a large room on the ground floor, and a larger still overhead, were filled to overflowing by a frightfully unclean company, almost every member of which was the proud possessor of a live pigeon. There were some few who kept the idol of their worship in a handsome box of polished mahogany, but the majority carried their precious property in a stout brown paper bag perforated at the sides for ventilation, and this receptacle, to avoid accidents, was bestowed in the owner's cap, which almost invariably was of limp material and shaped like a pudding basin.

The excitement was great when I reached the place of meeting, for the "c'rect card" had been issued but a few minutes before. The starting points were east, west, north, and south, at a distance of five measured miles, and the one winning-post was head-quarters,—the room in which the two umpires and the referee sat awaiting the result. But the difficulty was to adjust satisfactorily the "timing" of each pigeon. The owners of some of the birds resided in the same street, while others lived as far as a quarter of a mile off. Every pigeon wherever thrown up would, of course, make the best of its way home to its accustomed abode on the house-roof, where were in vigilant waiting those skilled in the art of capture, and long of leg and sound of wind for a smart run. The business of the correct card was to make known what was the "carrying time" allowed in each case, or in other words, how many seconds or minutes were granted for a bird's conveyance from the durmer where it alighted to the room where the judges sat.

The starters (accompanied in each case by those whose interest it was to "see fair") were each provided with a curious kind of timepiece—a watch enclosed in a little flat box with a lock, and an opening in the lid through which the face of the dial was visible. The judges lock these boxes and hold the keys, and a "master watch" likewise in a locked box remains at home, and is hung against the wall in the judges' room.

It was understood that the starts should take place at about four o'clock, and a few minutes after the feverish expectation began to manifest itself throughout the neighbourhood. On the roof of the tall old houses all round about anxious scouts were stationed, with their eyes screened with their hands, scanning the heavens as castaway sailors hungering and thirsting for sight of a sail scan the wide expanse of ocean. Men pale and anxious-looking congregate at street corners, calling up to those on the roof, "Are they coming? Are they coming?" with as painful eagerness in their voice as in that of the wicked Blue Beard's victim when she interrogated Sister Ann, who was looking for help out of window. With startling suddenness, however, a shrill whistle is presently heard, and a watchman, who with one arm is embracing a chimney-pot, is seen to wildly wave the other, and then to thrust his fingers in his mouth again, and emit a blast more ear piercing and prolonged than the first. Now the street from end to end resounds with shrill whistlings, and ere thirty may be counted is seen tearing up the middle of the road a shoeless, jacketless, capless young fellow, with his right hand jealously grasping a precious something concealed beneath the bosom part of his shirt. Pale and breathless he makes for the tavern, and bounding over the threshold with a hop, skip, and a jump, in a jiffy he is in the jury room where the master watch is hanging, and plucks from his breast the first pigeon! But not necessarily the winner of the race, that cannot be decided until the starters return and report the exact moment when each bird was despatched.

I was curious to ascertain the manner in which a pigeon was primed to do his "speedy utmost," and was not a little surprised to find that he is not primed at all. On the contrary, the bird is kept as hungry as they dare keep him—that is the spur relied on to incite him to make haste home, where he is aware there is an ample board spread for him. But in this nice discrimination must be used. If he is too "sharp set" the bird may be tempted to halt for refreshment on the road. I was seriously informed that a single bean might turn the balance one way or the other.

THE FOUR SEASONS—BY A. MARIE

EXHIBITED IN THE DUDLEY GALLERY

THE RUBENS TERCENTENARY

ANTWERP this week is all in holiday trim in honour of the most illustrious of her sons. Twelve hundred voices have filled her Place Verte with songs of praise to the accompaniment of cannon and trumpet and the sweet peal of the Cathedral chimes. M. Pecher's marble bust of the great painter has been duly unveiled, and formal eulogies delivered of Rubens and his school. The old house of Plantin, the famous printer of three centuries ago, has been inaugurated—by a happy bye-thought—as a new Musée, a counterpart of our own Caxton Exhibition. There are displays of 1,500 "Rubens" engravings, from collections in many cases quite inaccessible to ordinary sight-seers, and exhibitions of "objects of art," and paintings by old masters, representatives of the entire Dutch and Flemish schools, most discreetly selected and arranged by the Committee, known profanely as the "Commission du Nu." And besides all these there are torchlight processions and triumphal arches, regattas, and agricultural shows—a medley, in a word, of modern gaieties and antique pageants, of the florid revelry of a Kermesse and the tawdriness of a Lord Mayor's Show with genuine love and pride of art, such as perhaps could only be combined in that quaint city on the Scheldt, over which hovers still the traditional spirit of the world famed guild and fraternity of St. Luke. The visitor, indeed, to Antwerp, even in its every-day garb, is bathed at once in an atmosphere of art; his first stroll among the winding streets is quite a ramble in an Art Valhalla. Explore the pretty city park, and your choice is between the avenues of Rubens, of Quentin Matsys, and of Van Eyck. Approach the busy streets beside the Scheldt, and your entry may be by a Quai Plantin, your exit by a Quai Jordaens. Between the quarters named after Van Dyck one loses sense of time and distance. Yet amongst all whom she delights to honour not one can claim so large a share in Antwerp's heart of hearts as Rubens. Not the Cathedral with its eternal joy-peal, not bon père Antigon, the wicker-work giant, whose original long ago kept, it is said, the ferry on the Scheldt and playfully cut off and threw away the hands of impecunious passengers, are half so dear to the true Anversois as his own inimitable Sir Peter Paul. Nothing, in truth, is too great or too small that can serve as a memorial of him. From the "Descent from the Cross," the masterpiece of his 1,280 works, we are led off to his painter's chair under a glass case in the Museum, from his tomb at St. Jacques to the single bronze balustrade contributed by him as one of a few rich citizens who clubbed together to buy a new set of altar railings.

Antwerp, it must be owned, on this occasion in her desire to do Rubens honour has shown very considerable ingenuity. Most nowadays among the famous dead may expect one centenary commemoration. Antwerp, however, has so contrived it that within forty years Rubens shall have had two—the first just seven and thirty years ago, with banners and speeches and unveiling of colossal statues, the bi-centenary of his death—the second this week, with more banners, speeches, and statues, the tercentenary of his birth. Yet for some time a drop of bitterness clung to the cup of this year's jollity. Rubens, it was said, was undoubtedly not born in August, and almost as undoubtedly not born in Antwerp. Had not Mynheer van den Brink told the tale of false pedantic Doctor Jean and the light wife of William the Taciturn, of faithful loving Marie Pypelinex, of the internment of the adulterous husband at Siegen, and the veil thrown upon all the family movements at this time by mutual consent of prince and burgher? Fresh documents, says The Times, have now been found, proving, that for one all-important interval at least—the period of the great painter's birth—Dame Rubens was a resident at Antwerp. We know not whether the archivist's last word is spoken. In any case, and in the fullest sense, Rubens, wherever he first saw the light, is indisputably Antverpia oriundus; no child of Styrian immigrants, as German legend-mongers once attempted to make out, but of a true line of Flemish burghers—tanners for the most, with here and there a druggist—reaching far back to Adolph Rubens, tanner of Antwerp, A.D. 1350. And well may Antwerp cherish the memory of him who was at once the founder of her second and greater school of painting, and the last and chiefest of those Painter Princes in whose houses Art put on an almost royal dignity.

There, won by the charms of Isabella Brandt even more than the persuasion of Arch-Duke Albert and his bride, did the young painter give up for good his dreams of a life residence in art-loving Italy. There did he build the "lordly pleasure house," whose treasures, even after Buckingham had bought 100,000 florins' worth, fetched 25,000*l.* at his death; whose garden encroaching on that of the Arquebusiers gave rise to the amicable suit settled, as all men know, by the painting for the Guild of the famous "Descent from the Cross," and the quaint bill (still extant) in which florins so and so to the Sieur Rubens for paints and gloves for Dame Isabel his wife stand side by side with so much, (at joint cost of Guild and Painter), for new measurements for the garden wall, and 323 pots of beer for the builder's men. There, amid jealous rivals and devoted scholars, did he cover acres of canvas with subjects taken indifferently from Scripture or mythology, with charming landscapes and spirited hunting-pieces, and all at prices which, greatly to the grief of anxious middle-men, the "cruell courteous Painter" never would abate. Thence did he set forth on the diplomatic journeys which won him spurs of gold in England and rank as Secretary to the Privy Council in Spain—journeys sometimes performed in secresy and fear, the diplomatist hidden beneath the painter's mantle; sometimes in state, with such a retinue of friends that miserly Don John of Portugal who had invited him to a visit, beholding the cortège from afar, feared to be eaten out of house and home, and sent in haste a trusty messenger with fifty gold pistoles and his master's excuses, "affairs of State had summoned him away." To whom the painter: "he regretted much to lose the honour of meeting Don John face to face; but for the pistoles, he did not need them, having, in truth, a thousand with him which he had hoped to spend in merriment with his master." There, four years after the death of his first wife, that excellente compagne; rien que de la bonté et de la delicatesse—we do not envy those who pretended to trace her features among the spirits in bale and those of the second wife among the souls in bliss in the "Last Judgment" at Dusseldorf—he married yet again "his niece, Helena Fourment," the daughter, that is to say, of his first wife's sister by Daniel Fourment, merchant of Antwerp, a blooming May of scarce sixteen, for whom Sir January, gouty and fifty-four, conceived so warm a passion that the marriage must, it seems, take place—Rubens being all-powerful with the Church—in Advent, avec dispense des bans et du temps clos. But January and May lived very happily—as happily, at least, as the gout would suffer—with five fair children to bless their union. Her portrait was directly taken by him fourteen times—the most famous examples those at Blenheim and St. Petersburg, that we have given from the Queen's collection, and the "Lady of the Pelisse" at Vienna—besides often serving as a model for female faces and ideal groups. And if in his last portrait by Van Dyck the noble features are furrowed by care and pain, and if his young widow soon forgot him for spruce Broeckhoven de Bergeyck no tongue was ever wagged in Brabant against the present felicity of the ten years' ménage. Of Rubens as a painter enough, probably, has been this week said and written to satisfy the most insatiable Art student. In religious matters an easy genial man, with nothing about him of the zealot or the ascetic, his life-story furnishes no point of quarrel for Antwerp Catholics and Liberals to take hold of. Before his tomb sectarian jealousies may naturally find a short repose. Will they not too before that other tomb—the closing pilgrimage, we believe, of the tercentenary—where Rubens's successor found on the Dutch frontier the rest which Catholic orthodoxy had refused him in his native land?

"UARDA: A ROMANCE OF ANCIENT EGYPT," by Georg Ebers, translated from the German by Clara Bell (2 vols.: Low, Marston, and Co.).—Herr Ebers, one of the most distinguished Egyptologists of the day, has poured forth all the large stores of his knowledge of the religious, political, social, and private life of the ancient Egyptians upon this romance, the conception of which, he tells us, arose within him when, in the winter of 1873, he was spending some weeks in one of the tombs of the Necropolis of Thebes in order to study the monuments of that solemn City of the Dead. He is anxious, however, that his work should not be regarded as a vehicle for teaching Egyptian history. The sketch of the time of Rameses II.—the Sesostris of the Greeks—is offered only as a background from a picturesque point of view. Whilst nothing has been neglected that could be learned from the monuments or the papyri, still, says the author, "the book is only a romance, a poetic fiction, in which I wish all the facts derived from history, and all the costume" (by which word he plainly means the general presentation of life such as it was at the period) "drawn from the monuments, to be regarded as incidental, and the emotions of the actors in the story as what I attach importance to." "Real, living men," he adds in the same preface, "dwelt by the old Nile-stream, and the poet who would represent them must courageously seize on types out of the daily life of modern men that surround him, without fear of deviating too far from reality, and, placing them in their own long past time, colour them only and clothe them to correspond with it." We think that Herr Ebers must be held to have accomplished the task he thus defines with perhaps as much success as the nature of his materials permitted; unless, indeed, the work had been taken in hand by one who, besides being as learned as himself, was also a novelist—or "poet," if the word pleases him better—of a very high order. His dramatis personæ are clearly conceived, distinct, and consistent; and if they are apt to strike us somewhat as abstractions and as lacking in life, much allowance must be made for the stupendous difficulty of causing us at all to understand and sympathise with the actors in a tale of Egyptian life of the middle of the fourteenth century before Christ. No mere outline of this tale could be rendered intelligible to the bulk of readers without lengthy explanations for which we have not room. We will confine ourselves, then, to saying that it turns chiefly on the attempted treason (related by Herodotus) of Ani, the cousin of Rameses II., and of purer blood than the monarch himself, left Regent of the Kingdom during Rameses' absence on one of his Syrian campaigns; on the love that springs up between Bent-Anat, the Pharaoh's daughter, and the young poet Pentaur, a priest of the temple called "the House of Seti," one of the largest in the City of the Dead at Thebes—it is still standing, we are told, and known as the Temple of Qurnah—and the fortunes of Uarda herself, whom we first meet in the hovel of her grandfather, the Paraschites, one of the unclean race who prepared bodies for the embalmer, but who turns out to be on the mother's side the granddaughter of the chief of the Danaids. Of equal importance with the above-named personages in the action of the story stand Ameni, the learned, astute, and ambitious chief priest of the House of Seti, at whose hands Mésu (Moses) is represented to have received that initiation into "the wisdom of the Egyptians" from which he fell away, and whose whole thought is how to sustain and advance the powers of the priesthood, menaced by the innovations of Rameses and his father, Nebsecht, a priest, but a sceptic "of the period," who has devoted himself to surgery, and the brutal and treacherous Paaker, the King's "pioneer." All these characters are drawn with elaborate and conscientious care, and all more or less arouse our interest, though belonging to an age so remote that it is little wonder that we hardly always realise them as beings of the same race as ourselves. Still, on the whole, we incline to think that it is rather on the score of what Herr Ebers, in the passage already quoted, calls its "costume," than of its portrayal of human emotion that the book will be found attractive by most of those capable of the effort—for there is no denying that it is an effort—needed to enter into and master it.

"World's End: a Story in Three Books," by Richard Jefferies (3 vols.: Tinsley).—We must pay Mr. Jefferies the compliment—if he considers it one—of saying that for intricacy and complication of plot "World's End" stands facile princeps amongst all novels that have fallen in our way for a long time past, whilst for startling and sensational effects it will compare favourably with any of them. We are afraid, however, that in his eagerness to produce something novel and striking the author has defeated himself. Novel-readers are for the most part an easy-going and rather lazy race, only able to enjoy, or even endure, mental bewilderment up to a certain point, and when that point is passed, and the calls on memory and attention become too heavy, apt to throw aside the offending work, as, in Lord Dundreary's words, "one of those things no fellah can understand." We are far from saying that Mr. Jefferies' plot is unintelligible, on the contrary, it is built up with a great deal of care and skill; but very much of it is far from easy reading, and we have, as the phrase is, to give our whole mind to it. When he himself felt it necessary to devote an entire chapter (Ch. XI., Vol. I.) to a recapitulation of what had gone before, with a view to its being used for reference, we wonder that it did not occur to him that a story which needed such aid was likely to be too involved and complicated either to please the public, or to deserve praise as a work of art. Besides, Mr. Jefferies has been so absorbed in the entanglements of his plot that he seems to have had no time left to take thought about his characters. These remain the merest lay figures, credited by the author, it is true, with certain attributes and tendencies for good or evil, but hardly displaying themselves to the reader at all. How, indeed, should they display themselves, when they are scarcely allowed to speak? for we doubt if all the discourse in the book taken together would fill more than sixty or seventy of its pages. To attempt an outline of the story we have here would be a task as much in excess of our space as of our powers. Suffice it to say that it abounds in incidents strange, moving, and horrible, due to merely human agency, and is flavoured moreover with a touch of the unearthly, as to which Mr. Jefferies would apparently have us reserve our judgment. We do not think that any competent critic who will read "World's End" carefully and without prejudice will deny that its author has in him the "makings" of a good novelist. He certainly succeeds in seizing on his reader's attention from his first start, and his story, with all its faults, is never for a moment dull or trivial. He has strength, though for the present we incline to regard it as the vis consili expers. If he will curb his tendencies in the direction of needless and annoying complexity, of extravagance, and of melodrama, and think out his dramatis personæ with at least as much care as he does the outward incidents that are to affect them, he may one day be entitled to an honourable place in that school of novelists of which Mr. Wilkie Collins is the admitted chief.

"Marley Castle," edited by Sir Garnet Wolseley, G.C.M.G., K.C.B., &c. (2 vols.: Remington and Co.).—We are afraid that the gallant and distinguished soldier who has been employing some of his leisure in editing this tale must be less competent as a judge of fiction than he has shown himself as a commander. Though "Marley Castle" has merit enough here and there to make us willing to allow that it may be considered on the whole up to the average of stories of its class, it is but a tame and feeble piece of work when all is said, and there is something ludicrous in the idea that a person of Sir Garnet Wolseley's eminence should have thought it worth his while to preside over its birth. As, however, he has done so, the book will no doubt be widely read, and the reading of it will harm no one, except by occasionally producing a feeling of much weariness. But we were rather surprised, we own, in a book edited by Sir Garnet Wolseley, to be introduced to a young lady 5 feet 10 inches in height, and developed in proportion. Surely he must know that such a monster would only be in place in a show.

"We have also received "Seed Time and Reaping," by Helen Paterson (Samuel Tinsley), a tale seemingly for children, fairly good of its kind, but not calling for any special notice here.

"THE FOUR SEASONS"

IN this charming series of pictures the artist, instead of following the somewhat hackneyed method of portraying the four seasons by such symbols as infancy, adolescence, maturity, and extreme age, has given to each the figure of a child; which, however, he has so surrounded with suggestive accessories that the mind of the spectator naturally reverts to that period of the year which each particular design is intended to represent. The dainty white dress and sun-bonnet of the tiny maiden in the first picture, the eager joy with which she plucks the meadow flowers, the flowers themselves, the trees in their glorious new array of leaf and blossom, and the contention of cloud and sunshine in the sky—all speak most eloquently of "Spring," that season of hope and joy which has been the theme of so many a poet's song. Next we have "Summer," a sturdy boy, exhausted by the heat, lying in happy slumber upon a mossy bank beneath the shade of a large umbrella; whilst the faithful dog, who has doubtless been his playfellow, and is now keeping watch over him, looks as if he too would fain indulge in sleep did not his sense of duty forbid. The aspect of the sky is positively torrid, and we can see that there is scarcely a breath of wind to cool the air. For "Autumn" the artist presents us with a nut-brown little maid with cheeks as plump and rosy as any of the fruits with which her basket is loaded; while for "Winter" we have a forlorn and sickly-looking little creature crouching upon a dreary, snow-covered door-step. We are, however, almost inclined to think that the choice of such a sad symbol was a mistake, for winter unquestionably has as joyous aspects as any of the other seasons.

"AN AWKWARD PREDICAMENT"

THIS picture has been most appropriately named. The tired sportsman and his good steed, after following the hounds for many a long mile, have become separated from their companions, and got into a strange part of the country. Just as the shades of evening are deepening into the blackness of night, the steed suddenly sinks nearly up to its haunches in a treacherous morass, and the dismounted rider, fearing to make matters worse by moving from the little patch of firm earth upon which he stands, shouts aloud for aid, and waves aloft his hat to attract the attention of the solitary shepherd whose figure is just visible on the crest of a distant hill. Let us hope that his cry will be heard, and that ere night closes in he may be released from his "awkward predicament."

"LUTHER BEFORE CARDINAL CAJETAN"

THIS highly dramatic incident in the life of Luther is thus narrated by himself:—"In the year 1518, the 9th of October, when I was cited to Augsburg, I came and appeared, Frederick, Prince-Elector of Saxony, having appointed me a strong convoy and safe conduct, and recommended me to the people of the city. . . . At the expiration of three days I went unto him in all humility, fell down first upon my knees, then prostrate upon the ground, where I remained at his feet till after the cardinal had three times bade me rise. Thereupon I stood up. This pleased him well, hoping I would consider and better bethink myself. The next day, when I came before him again, and would absolutely revoke nothing at all, he said to me, 'What! Thinkest thou the Pope cares much for Germany? His little finger is more powerful than all Germany. Or dost thou think the Princes will raise arms and armies to defend thee? Oh, no! Where, then, wilt thou remain in safety?' I replied, 'Under Heaven.'" It is this point in the colloquy which has been seized as the subject of the picture, from a photograph of which our engraving is taken. The original is the work of Professor W. Lindenschmit, of the Munich Royal Academy, who is one of the most learned historical painters of the Munich School.

THE SHIPWRECKED MARINERS' SOCIETY has within the last six months relieved 8,532 widows, orphans, and shipwrecked men, but owing to the insufficiency of its dividends has been compelled to sell out 1,170*l.* towards furnishing the pensions given every January to 1,090 widows of fishermen and seamen. These annual grants are of enormous benefit to their recipients, and are so valued by sailors that nearly 8,000*l.* was contributed to the Society last year by about 50,000 seamen—a proof that provident habits are on the increase. JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD-MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

2, Manchester Square.

I have examined Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Check Action as applied to their Pianos, and consider it a most ingenious and valuable invention, which cannot fail to meet with success.

SIR JULES BENEDICT.

45, Blandford Square, N.W.

I have much pleasure in testifying to the great excellence of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianofortes. Their "Perfect Check Repeater" produces a touch that is absolute perfection, and which is unsurpassed by any other maker, native or foreign.

SYDNEY SMITH.

6, St. Mary Abbot's Terrace, Kensington, W.

To Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.

I have much pleasure in testifying to the efficiency of Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Patent Check-Action (for Pianofortes), which I consider a very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted.

BRINLEY RICHARDS.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

The effect which "the Perfect Check Repeater Action," patented by Messrs. Brinsmead, produces on the touch, is everything that can be desired by an artist. It appears to me the most important invention of modern times, both for freedom of execution and expression.

I have equal pleasure in referring to Messrs. Brinsmead's New Metal-Back Pianofortes, which, as regards durability, richness, brilliancy, equality and contrast of tone, by far surpass Pianofortes of the ordinary construction at a much higher price.

I will not fail to draw the attention of Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian, of Schleswig-Holstein, to these inventions the next opportunity which may present itself.

CHARLES JOHN HERMAN EHLERS,
Conductor of the Philharmonic Society,
Capetown, Africa.

Bognor, Sussex.

The touch and tone of the Pianofortes manufactured by John Brinsmead and Sons are alike admirable, and having thoroughly examined their instruments, I have much pleasure in highly recommending them. In the present day there is so much imposition practised upon the musical public that the purchase of a Pianoforte that will give permanent satisfaction is a very important matter.

Dr. T. LLOYD FOWLE, M.A.

I have great pleasure in certifying to the fine, rich, and powerful tone of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianos, also to the great improvements they have succeeded in attaining.

As a Professor of the Harp, I can safely add that the mellow tones of their Short Iron Gold Medal Grands blend charmingly with the instrument I profess, and form a delicious ensemble.

FREDERICK CHATTERTON,
Harpist to the Queen.

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,

The Close, Hereford.

Dear Sirs,—Your Patent Action is one of the best I have met with. This combined with the equal tone of your instruments must commend them to those desiring a first-class Pianoforte at a reasonable price.

Yours faithfully,
G. TOWNSHEND SMITH,
Organist of Hereford Cathedral, and Director of the Hereford Festival.

8, Lower Rock Gardens, Brighton.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.

Gentlemen,—It gives me the greatest pleasure to state that I consider the instrument manufactured by you to be most excellent in tone, touch, and quality of material. I particularly admire your Pianos with the Patent Check Repeater Action and new Grand Construction, being a wonderful improvement upon the old system. In my opinion your firm having been successful in creating as good a touch to the Cottage Pianoforte as that usually accorded to the Grand. All those I have chosen have given the greatest satisfaction to the purchasers.

I am, gentlemen, yours very truly,
W. KUHE.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons. Dresden.

I have great pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your instruments. Your newly patented system, "the Perfect Check Repeater Action, when applied to these Pianos, greatly increases their value, and I have no doubt that these valuable improvements will excite general attention and admiration.

I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the perfection of Messrs. J. BOYTON SMITH.

To Messrs. J. Brinsmead and Sons, 18, Wigmore Street, W.

Gentlemen,—I have much pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your upright and horizontal Grand Pianofortes, as they are simply perfect in touch and tone.

THE BATTLE OF PLEVNA FROM THE TURKISH SIDE—THE RUSSIANS ATTACKING ONE OF THE ENTRENCHMENTS ON THE EAST OF PLEVNA

WITH THE TURKS

FOREIGN

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The past week has produced little change in the situation, and both combatants continue to play a waiting game, the Russians biding their time till their re-inforcements arrive, the Turks hanging back for Suleiman Pasha's expected crossing of the Balkans, and his junction with the two wings of the Turkish army. Thus the main interest in Europe lies in Suleiman's movements. Although all the cavalry are now on the northern side of the Balkans, the Russians were still in the Hain Koi Pass on Thursday week, when they defeated a Turkish force, and a Turkish victory was reported in the Hain Boghaz Pass on Friday. The same day Rassim Pasha coming from Kalofer occupied the Nedar Pass, and from thence marched to relieve the Mussulmans shut up in Hamidler, while Shakir Pasha blockaded the Shipka Pass, which was garrisoned by a Russian regiment with twenty-eight guns, and is said to have occupied the village on Sunday. On Tuesday Suleiman himself attacked the Russians in the Pass, and was repulsed; but subsequently resumed the attack. General Gourko, however, who has left his Balkan troops to assume the command of the Imperial Guard, declares that the Russian positions from the Danube to the Shipka Pass are so strong that the Turks will not venture to attack them. The trans-Balkan three weeks' campaign cost the Russians 1,603 killed and wounded, while their whole loss up to July 28th, according to official sources, amounted to 14,459 killed and wounded.

The grand assault on Plevna is still delayed, and the Russian reinforcements have been much retarded by the state of the roads near Sistova, which have become perfect morasses from the recent rains. The bad weather also has seriously affected the health of the army—of the staff in particular—and the Czar has accordingly joined the Grand Duke Nicholas at Studeni, a much more airy spot than Biela. His Majesty is stated to be in excellent health and spirits, and on Friday held a small review. It is said that 180,000 fresh troops are on their road to Bulgaria, and the Grand Duke Nicholas has ordered them to be hastened forward, allowing only half a day's halt at Simnitza, instead of a whole day. The Imperial Guard will reach Plevna next week, and no decisive movement will take place until their arrival, when the Roumanian troops now at the front will be sent to the rear, and the Grand Duke will take command. Osman Pasha in his turn is alleged to have received troops from Widdin, Nisch, and Sofia, but we hear that he is falling short of provisions. He has sent out several reconnoitring expeditions, some Circassians and Cossacks having a brush, close to Plevna, on Thursday, when both claimed the victory, and his advance guards are reported within twenty miles of the Sistova bridge. On Wednesday his troops advanced from Loftcha towards Selvi, on the road to Gabrova, in readiness to meet Suleiman's forces if they should succeed in approaching Drenova. Meanwhile a Russian division is endeavouring to cut the communications between Sofia and the Balkans, and to capture Osman's provision convoys. Mehemet Ali has been joined by Baker Pasha, and has been inspecting his advanced positions. On Wednesday week his troops defeated the Russians at Kasassiler, and on Sunday they had a skirmish on the hills of Bakhchechler, near Djuma. In the Dobrudscha the despatch of troops to Plevna has been stopped by the landing of 10,000 Turks from the Caucasus, who are concentrating round Bazardjik, while the Egyptian contingent also have disembarked at Sulina, and are supposed to be on their road to take Kustendjie and Medjidie, whence they would threaten General Zimmermannn at Tchernavoda. Kustendjie has been re-occupied by the Russians. Rustchuk and Giurgevo have been vigorously bombarding each other, and fresh siege guns have been brought up from Pyrgos. Not content with their artillery duel, the Turks on Thursday attacked the Russian posts before Dolob, and advanced against Bassardow and Kadkoi, being repulsed, but on Tuesday they resumed the attack. On Sunday the Turks at Silistria bombarded Kalarash. Preparations for a winter campaign are being made on both sides. The Turks are having warm clothes made for the soldiers, while the Russians are forming fuel depôts and providing winter stores and clothing.

Hostilities have recommenced in ASIA. After numerous skirmishes between Ismail Pasha and General Tergukassoff, which compelled the former to concentrate in the defile of Mysyn, General Melikoff attacked Mukhtar Pasha on Saturday; but the Turkish General was so strongly entrenched that the Russians were obliged to retire. Fighting was resumed next day with no better success. The only news of the Turkish fleet is the continued re-embarkation of Circassians and a fight near Poti between a Turkish frigate and two steam torpedo boats, one of the latter being sunk while the other escaped. Atrocity reports continue, and Adrianople is crowded with fugitives in the most abject condition of misery and terror. The Bulgarians found guilty are being punished, and in CONSTANTINOPLE their compatriots have been turned out of all Government posts unless they join the Œcumenical Church. The Porte has now called out all persons hitherto exempt from military service, and has negotiated a new loan of 5,000,000*l.* with the Ottoman Bank. The court-martial on Abdul Kerim and Redif Pasha continues, and in the Stamboul cafés mock trials are frequently held, at which the ex-War Minister is condemned to swallow molten all the gold he received from the Russians.

SERVIA has changed her Ministry, and M. Ristics is now at the head of affairs. Although the new Premier belongs to the War party he has declared that no change of policy is intended at present. It is reported, however, that the Moscow Committee has urged Servia to take up arms, and has promised to supply the funds.—There has been a good deal of fighting in MONTENEGRO, but the fall of Nicksics appears improbable, as there is now plenty of water in the fortress, and there are reports of a Turkish relief column being on the way.—In AUSTRIA M. Kossuth has issued an appeal to the Hungarians urging a Turkish alliance.

FRANCE.——Marshal MacMahon's north-western tour has not been altogether a triumphal progress, and notwithstanding flattering cries, decorations, bouquets, and sundry honeyed speeches from courteous authorities the Marshal has had to listen to some tolerably plain speaking. At Evreux he was told that the population was profoundly attached to the Republican Government, another speaker mentioned the injury caused to commercial interests by the present crisis, and a third made a Protectionist speech. The Marshal replied somewhat haughtily, alluding to the "excessive pretensions" of one of the Chambers, and declaring that the crisis would cease when "the wisdom of the country shall by the choice of fresh representatives have restored the accord momentarily disturbed between the public powers." As usual in the President's orations, the term "Republic," studiously used by most provincial authorities, was conspicuous by its absence. At Caen the officials were little more flattering; but at St. Lô the Bishop of Coutances in an obsequious address called the Marshal a "saviour," and at Cherbourg his reception was decidedly warmer, although a small Republican demonstration was made on his departure. Having said all he had to say at Evreux, the Marshal made no more set speeches. He returned to Paris on Tuesday, and at the Ministerial Council stated himself well satisfied with his trip. The Conservative journals, with the exception of a few Clerical sheets, also declare the tour to have been a success, but the Republican press assert quite the contrary, and allege that no telegrams excepting those containing complimentary reports were allowed to pass. At all events the Marshal intends to go south, and will be at Bordeaux about the second week in September, when he will also be present at the army manœuvres, which begin on the 29th inst. The Municipal Council at St. Etienne have refused to vote funds for his reception.

The Republicans have also had their innings by a speech from M. Gambetta at Lille, where he was dining with M. Testelin. The speech was as remarkable for its moderation as for its eloquence, indeed it is whispered that the ex-Dictator is becoming too moderate altogether for his Belleville constituents. He urged that the word "reprisals" should be blotted out from the political dictionary, and expressed himself convinced that the elections would give more than 400 seats to the Republicans. The Liberals seem more confident than ever of the prospects of the elections. They are jubilant at the results of the General Councils which met on Tuesday in the Departments, and whose members in most cases paid no attention to the Prefect's request that the Session should be treated as extraordinary, and no fresh elections made, while resolutions adverse to the Government were adopted in most of the Councils where the Republicans commanded a majority. The General Council elections will take place in November, when there will be a special session to apportion the taxes which should have been voted by the deceased Chamber.

An attack on Gen. Berthaut, the War Minister, by the Figaro, is causing considerable discussion in Paris, and Gen. Ducrot is accused by the semi-Ministerial Moniteur of having inspired the article. The Figaro gives an energetic denial, and the General is reported to have asked official permission to sue the Moniteur for defamation. The Bonapartists are quiet this week, but have been mourning the death of Dr. Conneau, one of the most faithful friends of the Imperialist régime. Dr. Conneau was physician to Queen Hortense, and afterwards devoted himself to Napoleon III., sharing in his Boulogne attempt and his captivity at Ham, whence he promoted his escape. On the Emperor's accession he became his private physician, and never left him until his death, while his disinterestedness was remarkable, as he would never accept any reward. Another notable death is that of M. Duvergier de Hauranne, jun. The only other items of interest are the prohibition of the publication of portraits of the 363 in the République Française, the closing of five Masonic Lodges at Toulouse, a letter from M. Ollivier recommending the usual Bonapartist panacea, a plébiscite, and the return of M. Thiers to Paris after a farewell ovation at Puys, near Dieppe.

In Paris M. Krantz has announced that the principal parts of the Exhibition buildings will be finished by the 15th prox., when the foreign sections can be commenced.

BELGIUM.——The Rubens Tercentenary fêtes began on Saturday at Antwerp. The town was splendidly decorated, flags abound even in the poorest quarters, while the principal streets were gay with Venetian masts and garlands, and magnificent triumphal arches were erected in the chief squares. The programme of festivities has been varied, ranging from an Agricultural and Horticultural exhibition to a Literary and Artistic congress, and lectures on Flemish painters. On Sunday, the painter's birthday, the Rubens Exhibition was opened, processions paraded the streets, forty-seven choirs held a competition, and bell-ringing and salute-firing were general. The two great events, however, were the performance, on Monday night, of a special cantata before the statue of Rubens at the Place Verte, accompanied by a band of trumpeters stationed in the Cathedral Tower, and by the fine old chimes, and concluded by a torchlight procession; and the opening of the Maison Plantin, the house of the Antwerp Caxton. The fêtes coincide with the Kermesse, so religious processions form a special feature, characteristic of devout Antwerp, where statues of the Virgin command every street corner; and a Mass in memory of Rubens was celebrated on Monday at the Church of St. Carlo Borromeo. The fêtes last until Monday.

ITALY.——The recommendation to British travellers in Italy to provide themselves with passports has annoyed the Italian Press, which considers the troubles somewhat exaggerated. The Home Minister has nevertheless been urged to provide that English travellers shall be unmolested in future. Military preparations are occupying Government attention. Thus Rome is at length to be fortified and supplied with 130 large guns, and a brigade of mountain artillery will be attached to the army. On the 30th September, 1876, Italy had a force of 1,045,643 men in the standing army and reserve. The Vatican has disavowed all connection with the Catholic League, and is trying to induce the Roumanians to retract some of their doctrines, and submit to the Holy See. Should they refuse a schism is inevitable.—Francolino, the head of the Neapolitan brigands, was killed on Monday.

UNITED STATES.——An energetic defence of the President's policy has been made by the Treasury Secretary, Mr. Sherman, at Mansfield, Ohio. He announced that the President has reduced the public debt by nearly 6,000,000*l.*; that there were hopes of converting the entire debt into Four per Cent. Bonds; and that, if the present progress continues, a specie standard would be reached in twelve months. He favoured the accumulation of a coin reserve, and spoke satisfactorily of the crops.—The centenary of the Battle of Bennington was kept last week. President Hayes was present, and there was a grand banquet, at which the toast of "Queen Victoria" was drunk with much enthusiasm.—The President has been visiting White Mountains, where he made a speech in favour of peace and harmony, and expressed a hope that at the end of his rule all citizens, of whatever party, might be able to say, "We are Americans."

INDIA.——No improvement in the famine reports, and The Times correspondent sums up the prospect of the autumn crops as "hopeless in Southern India, most critical in Western, Central, and Northern India, and fairly good in Eastern India." In Goojerat and Kattyawar the outlook is considered desperate, and famine is imminent in Burmah owing to the large exports of grain. In Madras the people not only want food, but clothes and shelter, as they have used the thatch from their houses as food for cattle, while prices are double what they were during the Bengal famine. The 1878 Agricultural Exhibition at Madras accordingly has been abandoned. A Durbar has been held at Delhi by the Governor of Bengal to present patents of nobility to several native gentlemen, and the Governor took the opportunity to protest against the disloyalty of the native Press. There has been a Suttee at Oomwarra in the Jeypore territory; the King of Burmah intends to protect Mandalay by laying down torpedoes; and there are rumours of a large English force being concentrated north of Lahore.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Colorado beetle in GERMANY has spread over twenty-five acres at Langen Reichenbach, near Torgau. Prince Bismarck has come back to Berlin to confer with the Emperor before going to Gastein.—In SPAIN the authorities have been busy making arrests in consequence of a Republican conspiracy; the dispute on the Spanish and English tariffs continues; and the King has given a flattering reception to Mr. Lowell, the new United States Minister. The army reorganisation, which was begun on January 1st, takes effect on the 1st prox., when Spain will command an army 200,000 strong on the peace footing, all Spaniards being liable to eight years' service—four on active duty and four in the reserve.—In EGYPT the Nile is 14 feet below the average for the last three years, and Colonel Gordon is going to meet King John of Abyssinia to treat for peace.—Opium smoking has been prohibited in CHINA by an Imperial edict.

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice have gone to Scotland for the autumn. They were to leave Osborne on Wednesday evening for Balmoral, but owing to the floods in the north, Her Majesty's departure was postponed until Thursday afternoon. Before leaving Osborne Her Majesty at the close of last week entertained at dinner, amongst others, Lord Beaconsfield, Admiral Sir George Elliot, Col. Chippendall, and Capt. Hon. E. Fremantle, of H.M.S. Lord Warden, and on Saturday the Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Meiningen arrived on a visit to the Queen. On Sunday Her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and the Princes Christian, Victor, and Albert, of Schleswig-Holstein, attended Divine Service at Osborne, the Rev. George Connor, Vicar of Newport and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, officiating. On Thursday the Queen and the Princess were expected to cross over in the Alberta to Gosport, where a special London and North Western Railway train would be in readiness to take the Royal party northwards. At Banbury there was to be a halt for refreshments while the saloon carriages were being prepared for the night journey. At Perth breakfast was to be served, and the train was timed to arrive about 2.30 yesterday (Friday), at Aberdeen, whence Her Majesty would proceed by road to Balmoral.

The Prince of Wales, who paid a brief visit to the King of the Belgians last week, returned from Ostend in the Osborne on Saturday, and, landing at Portsmouth, at once came up to London with his children, and joined the Princess of Wales and the King of Denmark at Marlborough House. In the evening the Prince and Princess and the King of Denmark went to the Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden. On Monday the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Meiningen lunched at Marlborough House. In the afternoon the Prince and his three younger children returned to the Royal yacht, Osborne, at Cowes. Prince Albert Victor is now convalescent, and it is hoped that he will be well enough to go to Osborne on Saturday with the Princess of Wales.

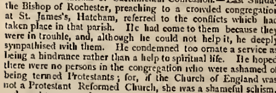
The Prince and Princess Christian are in Scotland.—The Duke and Duchess of Teck have gone to Homburg.—The ex-Empress Eugénie is with her son at Sandown, Isle of Wight.—The Crown Prince and Princess of Germany have returned to Germany from their visit to Belgium.—The Emperor of Brazil left Geneva last week for Grand Chartreuse.—General Grant will visit Stratford-on-Avon next month.—The Princess Mary, eldest daughter of Prince Frederick Charles, has been betrothed to the hereditary Prince of Schaumburg Lippe.

CHURCH NEWS

THE BISHOP OF LONDON ON THE RIDSDALE CASE.——Some communicants of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Hammersmith, have written to the Bishop of London stating that the Vicar had decided to discontinue the use of altar lights and vestments, "not in obedience to the decision of a tribunal having claim to the allegiance of Churchmen, but simply as a submission, 'for the work's sake,' to a secular Court, which has power by the exercise of force to carry out its decrees." They implored his lordship to endeavour to obtain the freedom for the Church to interpret her own rubrics in her own courts. The Bishop of London has replied that never probably had so strong and unimpeachable a tribunal sat as that which decided the Ridsdale case. Having some years ago examined the question of the legal meaning of the Ornaments Rubrics, he had arrived at the conclusion since formulated by the Judicial Committee; and a similar interpretation, and on the same grounds, had been given by learned men at times when no controversy existed on the subject, and when the question was examined as little more than one of legal curiosity.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL INSTITUTE, which was organised for the extension and improvement of Church of England Sunday Schools, has issued its thirty-third annual report. This Association devotes particular attention to the training of teachers, and promotes special examinations, which were attended last year by 635 teachers (144 more than in the previous year), 246 of whom passed in the first and 229 in the second class. Scholars' examinations have also been held with considerable success, while in many places higher class Sunday Schools for the children of the congregations have been established. The Committee now suggest the formation of normal classes, at which the art of teaching would be fully explained by lecturers. Of the 171 Sunday School Associations in England, 154 are in correspondence with the Institute, and furnish it with their annual reports. There are now in England 28,875 teachers, 3,539 belonging to the metropolis and 25,336 to the provinces, and 314,298 scholars, 46,515 in London and 267,783 in the country; while of the teachers 5,565 were formerly scholars. This Institute issues many valuable publications, particularly the "Notes of Lessons for the Aid of Teachers."

VARIOUS.——The Standard announces that Mr. Thomas Hedley, barrister-at-law, of Newton, Northumberland, who died a few days ago at Newcastle, has bequeathed upwards of 200,000*l*. for the endowment of a bishopric for the county of Northumberland.—In reply to a memorial denouncing the action of the extreme Ritualists as conspiring against the Reformed Church, the Bishop of Manchester has announced that in future he will not ordain to the priesthood, nor promote to the cure of souls, any clergyman who admits holding the doctrines of habitual or Sacramental Confession.—Last Sunday the Bishop of Rochester, preaching to a crowded congregation at St. James's, Hatcham, referred to the conflicts which had taken place in that parish. He had come to them because they were in trouble, and, although he could not help it, he deeply sympathised with them. He condemned too ornate a service as being a hindrance rather than a help to spiritual life. He hoped there were no persons in the congregation who were ashamed of being termed Protestants; for, if the Church of England was not a Protestant Reformed Church, she was a shameful schism, and ought not to have an existence.—Dean Stanley, who is taking a holiday in Scotland, preached last Sunday in the parish church of Roseneath.—Sermons were preached on Sunday in nearly all the churches in the Salford rural deanery in aid of the Diocesan Church Building Society and the Diocesan Board of Education. The Bishop of Manchester preaching at Christ Church, Salford, in aid of the latter society, said that the results of the Education Bill of 1870, were to a certain extent encouraging, but on the whole he considered the voluntary schools more efficient than board schools.—The Bishop of Bangor has issued an appeal for funds to secure candidates for Holy Orders "with a thorough knowledge of the Welsh language, the best intelligence, and highest culture." The youths are to be chosen by a Council, and maintained for four years at the Grammar School, Bognor, and afterwards for four years at Oxford. It is thought that with strict economy 1,500*l*. per annum will be sufficient.



THE WELSH EISTEDDFOD.——The Eisteddfod held this week at Carnarvon would seem to be a success. It began on Tuesday, and was to terminate yesterday. It is always an advantage when these ancient and patriotic assemblages are held at considerable towns. In small remote places they are naturally more or less insignificant, and do little, if any good. The presence of so learned and accomplished a master as the Cambridge Professor and Principal of our Royal Academy of Music, for chief adjudicator, conferred a dignity apart on the proceedings; and his decisions could hardly fail to give general satisfaction, carrying with them, as a matter of course, such weight as to allay all jealousy. Then, too, Professor Macfarren had, for coadjutor, a local gentleman of established position, in Dr. Rogers, organist of Bangor Cathedral.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.——On Wednesday night the first part of the programme was again "classical," being exclusively devoted to selections from the works of Beethoven. Beethoven (like Mendelssohn) is always a great name, even with a mixed public; and not only was the house crowded, but crowded by a seriously attentive audience. It was a genuine pleasure to observe the interest felt, from beginning to end, in a really splendid performance of the fourth symphony (B flat), most admirably conducted by Signor Arditi. Then, too, the grave, however magnificent, overture to Coriolanus was equally appreciated; while (as in poor Jullien's time) the allegretto from the Symphony No. 8 was encored, as a matter of course. Mdlle. Pommereul, who showed more talent and musical insight than she had been credited with in the opening movement of the violin concerto, was enthusiastically applauded. Mdlle. Marie Derivis gave Marcellina's air from Fidelio with charming expression, and the extra Beethoven programme was thoroughly enjoyed. The more of such concerts the better for Art. The great mixed public is easily taught to appreciate what is good. Poor Jullien knew that, as well as Mr. Arthur Chappell.

WAIFS.——The revival of Professor Macfarren's genuine English opera, Robin Hood, by Mr. Carl Rosa and his company, at Dublin, encourages a hope that it may once more be heard in London, when the enterprising German director returns, which it is believed will be early in next spring.—The great French manufacturer, M. Cavaillé-Col, having built a new grand organ for the church at St. Cloud, M. Gounod has undertaken to get up a musical and religious festival to celebrate the occasion of its opening.—Every amateur will be glad to hear that the popular lyric comedian, Madame Marie Cabel, is in a fair way of recovery. The paralysed arm is gradually regaining its pristine vigour, and Madame Cabel has been for some time able to leave her bed.—The King of Holland in his summer residence at Bagneres-de-Luchon, seems lavish of his decorations to musical artists. The latest recipient of the order of the "Oaken Crown" was the pianist and composer, M. Edouard Broustel, whose playing had highly gratified His Majesty.

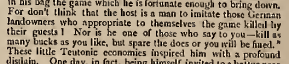
A CHASSE EN PLAINE IN FRANCE

To an Englishman perhaps the most notable thing about the French partridge season is the date of its commencement. Accustomed as he is to regard "the First" as a term synonymous with the opening of the campaign, he has a difficulty in looking upon the latter as a moveable feast to be altered year after year, according to the caprice of Nature or of the civil government of the country. This, however, it is; and if the thing were to be argued upon the mere ground of convenience and common sense there might, perhaps, be something to be said on both sides of the question. However that may be, it is certain that no one can in any year venture to predict very long before what will be the day or even the week of the ouverture. It is not until the harvest has begun, or at least till the wheat is assuming its golden tint, that the Departmental authorities meet in solemn conclave, and the day of doom for the partridges is fixed by immutable decree. Then the Prefect draws up his ordinance, the fatal bill is printed, and sent out, and is to be seen duly placarded in a conspicuous spot upon the walls and fences of each commune. Not only does the date of the season vary from year to year, but also from Department to Department. The earliest sportsmen are afield sometimes as early as the 12th of August, and the latest do not appear in a wet season till as late as if they were in England. In the sunny South the opening day is always at least a week in advance of the Northern provinces; and there is often even as much as three weeks' difference between the ouverture in the Basses Pyrénnés or the Bouches du Rhône, and in the Pas de Calais or the Ardennes. All this is very convenient in one point of view: for the fashionable sportsman who has friends in all parts of the country can so time his visits to them as to be there at the start in each case, and assist at several successive ouvertures in the same year. The morning of the ouverture is a grand occasion in every village all over France. The bells do not ring, it is true, and there is no military band; but the place wears quite a different aspect to that of the day before. Every landed proprietor—no matter how tiny his holding—has assumed in the meantime a new character. Yesterday he was only simple rentier; to-day he is chasseur. And be sure that he lets all the world know what a metamorphosis has taken place. He will be seen very early in the morning strutting about round what he calls his château, picturesquely attired in a dress which combines a little of the Italian brigand with a good deal of the English beater. If he possesses a dog of any kind, he will be heard whistling, and calling, and speechifying to it, and may be found feeding it with a dainty morsel or two, with a view of patting it in a good humour for the day. The French dog, be he terrier, turnspit, poodle, or anything else, is usually a thing for ornament alone, and not for use, deserving well of the company if he will only keep quiet and lag behind instead of rushing forward to disturb the game. A pointer is a rare creature indeed in a French kennel, and, when he is owned by any enterprising and ambitious sportsman, is brought out, in nine cases out of ten, with a portly corporation which would do no dishonour to an alderman, but would make the very hair of an English gamekeeper's head stand on end with horror and dismay. At nine o'clock, or even much earlier, the party of chasseurs is en route. Their passage through the town is watched by an admiring multitude, and each article of dress commented on with gusto by the bucolic or bourgeois connoisseurs. Nor is this introductory march always the least important part of the ceremony. French sporting, since the Revolution, is almost a thing of the past except for the upper ten. The system of endless partition between children has hopelessly cut up the good-sized estates, and unless some millionaire has bought out the small owners, and collected their petty plots within one ring fence, it is impossible to follow a covey, or even walk straight forward for half a mile, without coming upon some rival's territory. The sport is according restricted to walking backwards and forwards over a very limited space—a space which in England it would not take one gun half a day to beat. The rival proprietors watch one another with jealous eye, and occasionally wait idle with reciprocal impatience while a covey driven across the border is being shot at and sent back again. Occasionally the rivals make common cause together, and start in a joint party. Then there is something like rivalry—there is betting, shouting, and quarrelling without end. Everything ends happily in the end, of course, and at the conclusion of the hard day's work he who has made the largest bag marches back triumphant through the streets waving his spolia opima in the great net bag he carries, and wearing the crown of victory on his head.

It is all very well to laugh thus at the French idea of partridge shooting. But after all one of the best accounts of a First of September is from the pen of a French writer. "The first shots of the season," says Edmond About in the best of his novels, "are not fired in Alsace without a certain solemnity." The houses are filled with visitors; there are guns for all, and house-room for all. Then there is the "plaine" which is "peopled with hares and partridges," and there are quails, landrails, and an occasional blackcock on the rocks. Every sportsman carries off in his bag the game which he is fortunate enough to bring down. For don't think that the host is a man to imitate those German landowners who appropriate to themselves the game killed by their guests! Nor is he one of those who say to you—kill as many bucks as you like, but spare the does or you will be fined." These little Teutonic economies inspired him with a profound disdain. One day, in fact, being himself invited to a battue near the New Forest, he heard the proprietor announcing to his friends that the murder of a doe must be expiated by a fine of twenty-five francs. "Ah," said he, "I am glad to find that it is only a question of money;" and he killed thirty does in the day for the bagatelle of 750 francs. The proprietor in question was a Prince; but, exclaims the novelist, with a patriot's pride, "il avait trouvé ce jour-la, plus grand seigneur que lui!" M. About would, no doubt, if invited to shoot an English preserve, have thought it good taste to slaughter all the hen pheasants he came across. But nevertheless his sketch of a French chasse en plaine is very well worth reading, and on the whole is not untrue to the life.



MORE "SPIRITUALISM."——A curious story was told in a Liverpool Police Court the other day, when a man aged forty-five and a girl of sixteen were charged with having stolen a gold ring belonging to a widow lady with whom they had lodged. It seems that the man is a professed spiritualist, and that having first met the young lady at a séance at Macclesfield, he acquired such influence over her as to induce her to elope with him; his alleged object being to force her mother to consent to their marriage, and thus to obtain possession of the girl's fortune. They came to Liverpool and held séances at their lodgings, the girl professing to be a medium, and when the ring was missed they said that "the spirits had it and would bring it back." After hearing the evidence the magistrate said that the charge of felony was not sufficiently made out, and dismissed the case. The prosecuting solicitor then wished to prefer a charge of threatening to commit suicide against the girl, and another of abduction against the man, but the bench declined to entertain either.

THE EXTRADITION COMMISSION.——It is announced that the Commission to inquire into the working and effect of the law and treaties relating to the extradition of those accused of crime is to be composed of Sir Alexander Cockburn, Lord Selborne, Lord Blackburn, Mr. Russell Gurney, Q.C., M.P., Sir R. Baggallay, Sir W. Baliol Brett, Sir J. Rose, Sir J. Fitz-james Stephen Q.C., Sir William Vernon Harcourt, Q.C., and Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens, M.P.

THE ACCUSED DETECTIVES.——Three days were last week devoted to the further hearing of evidence in this case, which was ultimately again adjourned until Thursday. The cross-examination and re-examination of the convict Kurr lasted until one o'clock on Saturday, and he was succeeded in the witness-box by Henry Benson, another convict, undergoing a sentence of fifteen years' penal servitude, whose evidence, so far as it has been taken, tends to corroborate the statements made by Kurr. Special precaution was taken to prevent any communication passing between these men, Kurr being taken quite out of the Court before Benson was removed from the cell in which he was waiting. On Friday Mr. Besley renewed his application that Inspector Palmer should be admitted to bail, urging that to confine him any longer would be really punishing him before trial. Sir James Ingham replied that he was inclined to accede to the application, and Mr. Poland remarking that he should not stand in the way, bail to the amount of 1,000*l*. was taken, and Palmer was released at the close of the day's proceedings. Great crowds continue to assemble in and around the court during the progress of the case. On Saturday the King of Denmark, the Lord Mayor, and Lord Alfred Paget were amongst the visitors. Lord Clinton, whose name has been mentioned by Kurr, has written to the newspapers stating that he knows nothing whatever of the case except through the newspaper reports. "Walker," the Dover constable spoken of by Kurr, has been suspended by the Watch Committee of the town, and at Glasgow a local official inquiry into the discipline and conduct of the police has been commenced.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——We are glad to see that Mr. Cross's suggestions with regard to Italian vagrants are already being acted upon. The two children who were last week remanded to the House of Correction, have now been handed over to the Italian Consul, and when their padrone comes out of prison at the end of the month, they will be safe at home with their mother in Italy. At Bristol five other children were this week arrested, but were given up to their parents on the promise that they should be at once taken back to their own country.—A big burglary has been committed at Bromley in Kent. The thieves carried off 6,000*l*. worth of plate, leaving behind them in exchange a large and curious collection of housebreaking implements.—One result of the blocking up of Fleet Street by the paving companies is, of course, to turn the omnibus traffic out of its accustomed route, to the great annoyance of everyone concerned. The other day a gentleman who was put down on the Holborn Viaduct instead of at New Bridge Street, grew wrathful, and flatly refused to pay his fare. He was accordingly summoned, and had to pay seven shillings costs, in addition to the disputed twopence, Alderman Sir A. Rose deciding that the driver of the vehicle was not in fault. We are only surprised that the intolerable nuisance caused by the stoppage of such a thoroughfare as Fleet Street has not given rise to many such complaints.—Mr. Vaughan, the Bow Street magistrate, has just read a very salutary lesson to the licensed victualling fraternity, some of whom it appears have been deluding themselves with the idea that there is no harm in diluting gin with water in order that the mixture may be sold profitably at a low price. The decision is that whenever this is done the compound must be sold as "gin and water," and must not on any account be called "gin" no matter what the "custom of the neighbourhood" may be. It is as well that publicans should know that a fraud of this kind subjects them to a penalty of from 5*l*. to 10*l*.—The other day an Irishman presented himself at Bow Street Police Court claiming the advice and sympathy of the magistrate in relation to his domestic troubles. It appeared that his better half, who was "English born," was in the habit of boasting that she was "John Bull," which he was not, that she knocked him about, broke his windows, and threatened to get him penal servitude for life because she had "fallen down and cut her lip against the kerb." "What can I do," said the distressed husband, "when she lies down on the flat of her back and says she's dead?" This perplexing question was skilfully avoided by the magistrate, who promised to punish the woman if she was brought before him for assault or wilful damage.

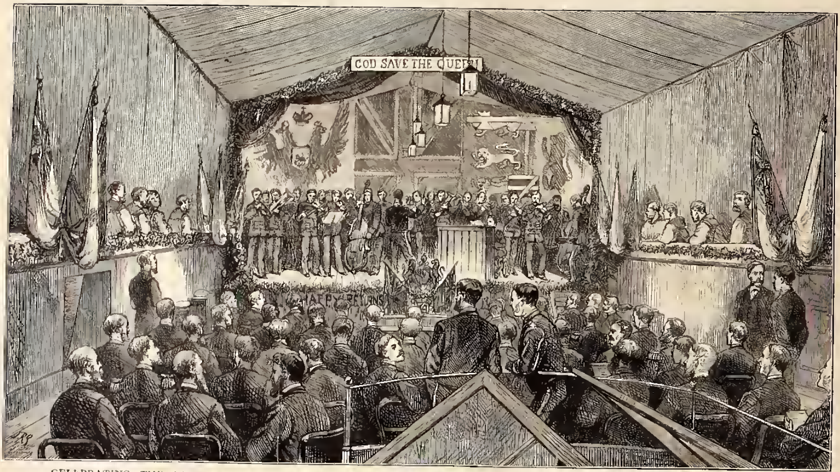
THE BLUE GLASS MANIA ACROSS THE ATLANTIC has been greatly discussed of late, and gigantic vegetables and babies have been brought forward as a proof of its efficacy. Now, however, it is to be the turn of the other colours, and Dr. R. C. Croft writes calling attention to the extraordinary effect of light transmitted through a yellow blind upon patients suffering from small-pox; and suggesting that ladies visiting the sea-side would find extreme comfort by using yellow gauze instead of brown or green veils. The theory of this is simple, inasmuch as light transmitted through a yellow medium loses its chemical properties, and may be admitted with impunity to the most severely inflamed eye or the most delicate skin.

THE PARIS GOBELINS TAPESTRY manufactory is to be entirely re-organised, the designs and execution of the tapestry having greatly deteriorated of late. In future all workmen are to be taught the rudiments of Art, the designs are to be chosen by competition, and the cleverest workmen sent to study at the Fine Art School. The process of manufacture is also to be simplified, orders executed for private persons, and a new tapestry museum formed. The Gobelins owes its origin to Henri IV., who imported a number of tapestry workers from Flanders, and established them in the Louvre, where he created a school of industrial art, and set up a manufactory of Persian carpets. Louis XIII. removed the works to the Gobelins, and Colbert, later on, collected together the different colonies of tapestry-workers scattered about Paris, and organised the present national manufactory.

INDIAN MUSIC rarely pleases European ears, but the description of Hindu melody given by the Times of India may lead to its better appreciation. The beauty of Hindu music is said to consist in the intervals—breaks or sruti—between each note. The scale has three octaves of seven notes with twenty-two different kinds of sruti to each note, but this scale has been reduced to two and a-half octaves to suit the compass of the human voice. There are three modulations in the voice—the mandra or chest voice, the madhya or throat voice, and the tara or brain and nose voice. Of the seven notes, the first, sa, was imitated from the cry of a calf, ri from the bellowing of an ox, ga from the bleating of a goat, ma from the howling of a jackal, pa from the piping of a blackbird, dha from the croaking of a frog, and ni from the noise of an elephant. To express the notation only one line is used with the initials of these notes and other signs, and harmony is not regarded, as the whole character of Hindu music is that of melody. There are six Ragas, songs to be sung at certain seasons and expressing various feelings—such as love, fear, anger, &c. An aggregate of srutis is termed a swara or musical sound, "exercising a calm and soothing influence on the ear."



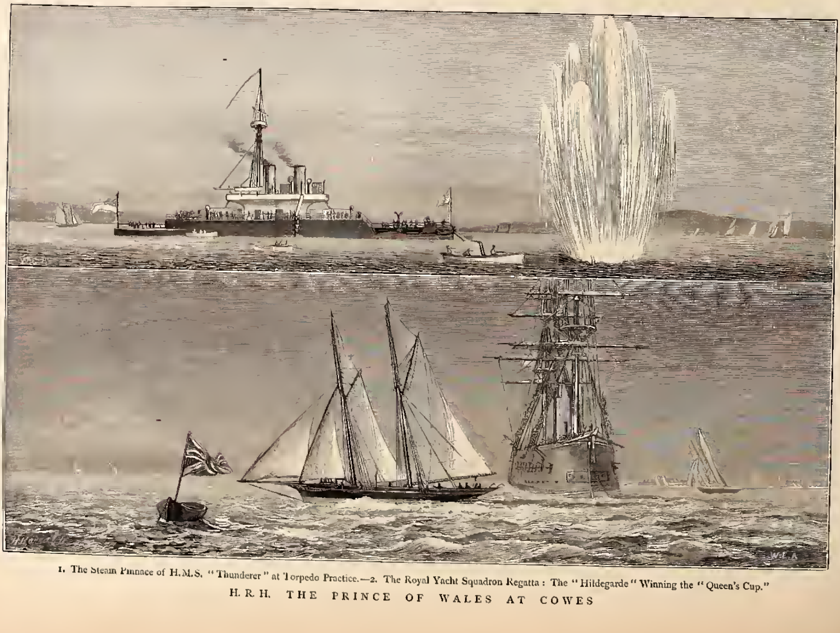
CELEBRATING THE BIRTHDAY OF H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH ON BOARD H.M.S. "SULTAN" IN BESIKA BAY

CELEBRATING THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH'S BIRTHDAY

THE natal anniversary of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh was celebrated in the fleet at Besika Bay on the 6th inst. by a regatta for prizes given by the officers of H.M.S. Sultan, of which vessel the Duke is the commander. In the evening an orchestral concert by the united bands of the squadron took place on board the Sultan, the Duke leading the orchestra himself with great effect, and the officers of the Fleet were afterwards entertained at supper by their Royal host. We append the programme of the concert:—1. Overture, "Crown Diamonds," Orchestra. 2. Duet, Mendelssohn, H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh and Lieut. Neville. 3. Solo, "Slumber Song," H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh. 4. Song, "The Bell Ringer," Lieut. Swinburne, R.M.A. 5. March, Sir G. Elvey, Orchestra. 6. Introduction, "Lohengrin," Orchestra. 7. Selection, "Il Talismano," Orchestra. 8. Valse, "Galatea," Orchestra.—"God Save the Queen."

THE CHINESE AMBASSADORS AT CHATHAM

ON Thursday last week their Excellencies Kuo-ta-jen and Liu-ta-jen, accompanied by their English interpreter, Dr.



1. The Steam Pinnace of H.M.S. "Thunderer" at Torpedo Practice.—2. The Royal Yacht Squadron Regatta: The "Hildegarde" Winning the "Queen's Cup."

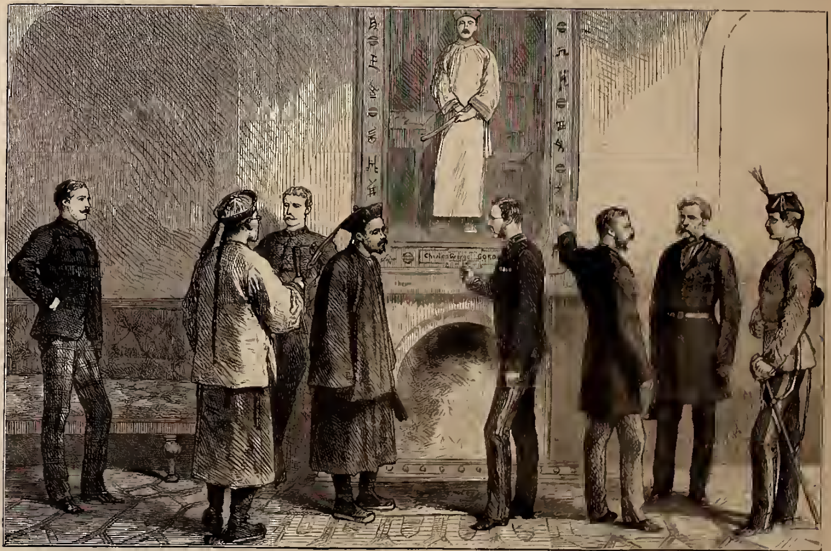
THE REINFORCEMENTS OF THE MEDITERRANEAN GARRISONS—DISEMBARKATION OF TROOPS FROM H.M.S. "CROCODILE" AND "EUPHRATES" AT MALTA

Macartney, visited the School of Military Engineering and the Institute of Royal Engineers at Chatham. After witnessing a review of the garrison troops under General Erskine, and lunching with the officers of the Royal Engineers, they were shown through the building. In the smoking-room their attention was attracted by a huge German map of the Seat of War in Turkey, with the positions of the contending forces indicated by means of little moveable flags, and they displayed great interest in the explanations of the scientific tactics given by one of the Colonels of the Royal Engineers. In the next room hung a portrait of the celebrated General Charles George Gordon, R.E., in the dress of a Chinese mandarin. The names of the places where Gordon achieved most of his victories when in the service of the Emperor of China are inscribed in the Chinese language upon the frame of the picture, and the Celestial visitors detected an error in the spelling of one of these words. This forms the subject of our sketch, Dr. Macartney being shown in the act of pointing out the misspelt word to the Commandant. Subsequently, the party went up the River Medway to the pontooning camp of the Royal Engineers, and witnessed some experiments with gun-cotton for destroying stockades and railways, and they were afterwards photographed in a group by the Royal Engineers.—Our engraving is from a sketch by Capt. H. G. Robley, of the Princess Louise's Argyll Highlanders.



THE CHINESE AMBASSADORS AT CHATHAM—INSPECTING THE PORTRAIT OF GEN. C. G. GORDON, R.E. ("CHINESE GORDON")

THE AMERICAN ARCTIC EXPEDITION, which is to leave New York next July, has sent out a pioneer vessel, the Florence, to establish the first station for supplies. The Florence is a small schooner sixty-four feet long, and has been carefully repaired to resist blows from the ice. She is commanded by Captain Tyson, who was in the Polaris, carries a naturalist, a meteorologist, and photographer, three officers, and a crew of eight men, is well provisioned, and furnished with ammunition and whaling line in expectation of some sport in Baffin's Bay. The vessel is to winter on the west coast of Davis Strait, probably in Cumberland Sound, about lat. 65° N., where the explorers will collect dogs and Eskimo hunters ready for next year. The main body of the expedition in 1878 will try to plant a colony of fifty men in Discovery Harbour, where the Discovery wintered in 1875-6, a spot chosen because game and coal can be found in the neighbourhood. Here the colony, consisting of three executive officers, two surgeons, and three naturalists, with forty-two men from the army or navy, would be left well provisioned and in a comfortable house for three years; while a second party would be established at Cape Joseph Henry, ninety miles to the north, and communication would be kept up by means of a copper wire. From this second station the party would start for the Pole, as Captain Howgate, the promoter of the Expedition, believes that at some seasons lanes of water open up north of Robeson Channel, by which boats might journey towards the Pole if men were on the spot to seize the opportunity. He also thinks that land exists in lat. 85° N., where another provision depôt might be formed, and thus, even should no waterway be available, the desired goal might be reached by sledging parties. Anent Arctic voyages, Lieut. Weyprecht of the Austrian Polar Expedition in 1874, and Count Wilczek are going to spend a year in Nova Zembla to make meteorological observations. They wish to establish stations on the American plan, and propose the formation of colonies in Spitzbergen, on the Siberian coast, near the mouth of the Lena, in 71° N., near Point Barrow east of Behring Strait, and in Nova Zembla and East Greenland, while they also suggest a station on the Antarctic borders, at either Cape Horn, the Kerguelen, or Auckland Islands to make simultaneous observations.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. R. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. PARKER. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 29 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

ORIGINALS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine tact. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. . . . It is the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MR. MECHI'S ADDRESS to his OLD FRIENDS and CUSTOMERS and to the PUBLIC:
"As it has been erroneously supposed by some that I am no longer interested in my London business, I think it desirable to state that I continue to carry it on as energetically, and I trust, as satisfactorily to the Public, as formerly, assisted by my only son, who will in due time succeed me. It is now 50 years ago since I first commenced business in Leadenhall Street, and what changes have taken place! Then everybody shaved, and my razor and razor strop trade was immense; now moustache and beard are the order of the day, and the razor and strop trade is comparatively defunct. Then there were no railways, so people stayed at home and used wooden dressing-cases; now everybody travels by rail, and we have dressing-bags to suit the altered conditions. Fifty years ago the poor geese supplied our pens, and many a now rich merchant in the City will remember the quality of Mechi's shilling pen-knives; but steel pens have extinguished the pen knife trade and the penmaking machines, and the geese are in peace, except at Michaelmas. In fact, steam has altered, and, I may safely say, improved everything, and has made us a nation of travellers both by land and sea. I wonder how much time is now occupied in reading the steam-worked press? and how much less time is occupied in sipping port wine, as we used to do 50 years ago, when we could not travel? Steam will make our 4 lb. loaves cheaper some day, just as it has converted calico from 2s. 6d. to 6d. or less per yard. Then, again, a letter which used to cost 6s. 6d. to Cork is now carried for a penny. Sir Rowland Hill richly deserves a monument. But to return to business: 50 years ago, when I first commenced on a small scale, I made it an axiom that what I sold should be good and useful, and I believe thousands who used the Strop and Paste, which I personally invented, can certify to this; in fact, it was sometimes complained of that I stamped on my razors, 'Exchanged if not approved.' I have never, and shall never so long as I live, deviate from that principle, because it is the true means to retain and increase one's connection. I devoted my attention especially to the quality and convenience of arrangements in the Dressing Bag and Dressing Case Department, and in the tasteful selection of articles suitable for presentation, as well as on the matter of Despatch Boxes and Writing Cases. Although both razors and penknives have 'gone out,' our sportsmen remain, and 'Sporting Knives' form one of our special departments. I feel firmly convinced that there is no fear of the departure of knives and forks, or dinners, so we make this an important department in quality and price. In conclusion, I ask no favours, but simply desire that my customers should compare the quality and price of my wares with those of other dependable establishments, and form their own conclusions. Most of my worthy assistants and workmen have been nearly forty years in my service, and long ago learned that civility and attention to our customers are as important as good quality in the articles sold. Illustrated catalogues will be forwarded post free on application."

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed-for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

THE AMERICAN ARCTIC EXPEDITION, which is to leave New York next July, has sent out a pioneer vessel, the Florence, to establish the first station for supplies. The Florence is a small schooner sixty-four feet long, and has been carefully repaired to resist blows from the ice. She is commanded by Captain Tyson, who was in the Polaris, carries a naturalist, a meteorologist, and photographer, three officers, and a crew of eight men, is well provisioned, and furnished with ammunition and whaling line in expectation of some sport in Baffin's Bay. The vessel is to winter on the west coast of Davis Strait, probably in Cumberland Sound, about lat. 65° N., where the explorers will collect dogs and Eskimo hunters ready for next year. The main body of the expedition in 1878 will try to plant a colony of fifty men in Discovery Harbour, where the Discovery wintered in 1875-6, a spot chosen because game and coal can be found in the neighbourhood. Here the colony, consisting of three executive officers, two surgeons, and three naturalists, with forty-two men from the army or navy, would be left well provisioned and in a comfortable house for three years; while a second party would be established at Cape Joseph Henry, ninety miles to the north, and communication would be kept up by means of a copper wire. From this second station the party would start for the Pole, as Captain Howgate, the promoter of the Expedition, believes that at some seasons lanes of water open up north of Robeson Channel, by which boats might journey towards the Pole if men were on the spot to seize the opportunity. He also thinks that land exists in lat. 85° N., where another provision depôt might be formed, and thus, even should no waterway be available, the desired goal might be reached by sledging parties. Anent Arctic voyages, Lieut. Weyprecht of the Austrian Polar Expedition in 1874, and Count Wilczek are going to spend a year in Nova Zembla to make meteorological observations. They wish to establish stations on the American plan, and propose the formation of colonies in Spitzbergen, on the Siberian coast, near the mouth of the Lesia, in 71° N., near Point Barrow east of Behring Strait, and in Nova Zembla and East Greenland, while they also suggest a station on the Antarctic borders, at either Cape Horn, the Kerguelen, or Auckland Islands to make simultaneous observations.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. R. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. PARKER. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere at one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 29 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

DRAWINGS BY THE ITALIAN MASTERS:
REPRODUCED BY THE
AUTOTYPE PROCESS
FROM THE
With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine tact. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. Of the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MR. MECHI'S ADDRESS to his OLD FRIENDS and CUSTOMERS and to the PUBLIC:
"As it has been erroneously supposed by some that I am no longer interested in my London business, I think it desirable to state that I continue to carry it on as energetically, and I trust, as satisfactorily to the Public, as formerly, assisted by my only son, who will in due time succeed me. It is now 50 years ago since I first commenced business in Leadenhall Street, and what changes have taken place! Then everybody shaved, and my razor and razor strop trade was immense; now moustache and beard are the order of the day, and the razor and strop trade is comparatively defunct. Then there were no railways, so people stayed at home and used wooden dressing-cases; now everybody travels by rail, and we have dressing-bags to suit the altered conditions. Fifty years ago the goose supplied our pens, and many a now rich merchant in the City will remember the quality of Mechi's shilling pen-knives; but steel pens have extinguished the pen knife trade and the penmaking machines, and the geese rest in peace, except at Michaelmas. In fact, steam has altered, and, I may safely say, improved everything, and has made us a nation of travellers both by land and sea. I wonder how much time is now occupied in reading the steam-worked press? and how much less time is occupied in sipping port wine, as we used to do 50 years ago, when we could not travel? Steam will make our 4 lb loaves cheaper some day, just as it has converted calico from 2s. 6d. to 6d. or less per yard. Then, again, a letter which used to cost 6s. 6d. to Cork is now carried for a penny. Sir Rowland Hill richly deserves a monument. But to return to business: 50 years ago, when I first commenced on a small scale, I made it an axiom that what I sold should be good and useful, and I believe thousands who used the Strop and Paste, which I personally invented, can testify to this; in fact, it was sometimes complained of that I stamped on my razors, 'Exchanged if not approved.' I have never, and shall never so long as I live, deviate from that principle, because it is the true means to retain and increase one's connection. I devoted my attention especially to the quality and convenience of arrangements in the Dressing Bag and Dressing Case Department, and in the tasteful selection of articles suitable for presentation, as well as on the matter of Dispatch Boxes and Writing Cases. Although both razors and penknives have 'gone out,' our sportsmen remain, and 'Sporting Knives' form one of our special departments. I feel firmly convinced that there is no fear of the departure of knives and forks, or dinners, so we make this an important department in quality and price. In conclusion, I ask no favours, but simply desire that my customers should compare the quality and price of my wares with those of other dependable establishments, and form their own conclusions. Most of my worthy assistants and workmen have been nearly forty years in my service, and long ago learned that civility and attention to our customers are as important as good quality in the articles sold. Illustrated catalogues will be forwarded post free on application."

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

Circassians—had slaughtered and maimed the Russian wounded and prisoners before retreating from the advancing enemy. "On the way along the position," he writes, "looking down to the right from the road, there, heaped round a telegraph post on the green sward are the heads that had thought and planned and hoped and feared but yesterday, perhaps this morning, but they looked small and shrunken, probably from loss of all blood, and the countenances tell no tale, as far as I could see, in a hurried, horrified examination." On reaching the summit of the pass he came upon a circle of Russians, officers and men, gazing fascinated at a spectacle within. "There at last are the bodies collected together for examination, all headless, some cut from limb to limb. . . . But were these men alive or dead when they were thus treated? With regard to some there may be a doubt, but with regard to others no doubt. . . . The proof was all too plain. There lay men who had been wounded or unwounded prisoners, in the hands of the Turkish 'gentlemen,' who had foully murdered and mutilated them, showing thus that they are savages as cruel as any in Africa or India. And but a few paces distant the Russian medical men were dressing the wounds of these savages, and soldiers standing round guarded them from all evil, even the righteous indignation which filled their own breasts." We will not pursue this painful subject further, but turning to a brighter side of warfare, another sketch shows a company of Cossacks saving a number of the wounded of the Bulgarian legion during the subsequent battle at Yeni Sagra, whence on the advance of the Turks the Russians carried off as many Bulgarian civilians as were compatible with the safety of the army. Another episode during the battle of a somewhat humorous character is also represented. Some Turks were surprised by a sudden attack on the part of the Russians, who had not given them time to descend from the trees where they had been stationed. The Russian soldiers, more merciful than their enemies would have been, began to exhort their captives to come down from their perches, crying, "Aman! Aman!"—"I pardon you, I pardon you!" The remaining sketches are sufficiently explained by their titles, but with regard to the Russian officers bathing in a mill-stream, we may mention that these streams form the only water supply of the district, there being no rivers of any noteworthy size.

WITH THE RUSSIANS SOUTH OF THE BALKANS

THE first of the two war sketches on our last page represents a council of war at a farmhouse at Ackjar, near Bulgar Karagatch, the headquarters of the Grand Duke Nicholas after the defeat at Plevna. The subject of the deliberation as may be easily guessed was the advisability of renewing the attack on that important position. A correspondent of the Daily News thus describes the scene:—"At half-past four the entire calvacade had gathered in front of the Grand Duke's place of sojourn. The Commander-in-Chief sat on a wooden stool in the centre of the farmyard, receiving and reading despatches." "Threshing Corn at Poudin" depicts a detachment of dragoons abandoning for a time their swords and carbines and taking to more peaceful implements, such as the flail and fan.

"CELIA'S ARBOUR,"

A NEW STORY, by the authors of "Readymoney Mortiboy," &c., is begun on page 205.

A PICNIC PARTY ON THE LAGOON, VENICE

IN the picture before us, Mr. Kilburne has given us one of the most charming features of Venetian life. Notwithstanding all the picturesque attractiveness of the Grand Canal, its innumerable palaces and far-famed Rialto, or of those delightful side canals, where so many glimpses of modern Venetian life and character are to be obtained, there at length comes a time when the visitors begin to find the air close and heavy, and the odours a trifle pungent, and even the intricate labyrinth of waterways growing monotonous. Then remembering the broad lagoons which girt the town, and providing himself with a basket of fruit, and a bottle of bright red wine, directs his ever faithful gondolier, who for fivepence an hour acts as boatman, guide, and if need be, waiter—to steer for the open water, there to enjoy the gentle breeze which so gratefully tempers the scorching sun. Or perhaps he may venture as far as the Lido—that sandy bar which protects Venice from the rude waves of the yellow Adriatic, and which is ever a favourite picnic spot for the Venetians and their visitors.

OUR OBITUARY RECORD

MR. WILLIAM LONGMAN, who died on the 17th ult., was one of the principal partners in the world-famous publishing firm of Longman and Co., Paternoster Row. He was born in 1813, and at a very early age entered his father's business, in which he became a partner in 1839. On the death of Mr. T. N. Longman, in 1842, the chief direction of affairs was assumed by William and his elder brother, the present Mr. Thomas Longman, under whose management some of the most notable and successful publications of the firm have been issued. Amongst these may be mentioned the works of Macaulay, the Waverley Novels, Victor Hugo's writings, Colenso's famous treatise on "The Pentateuch," the "Greville Memoirs," "Lothair," &c. Mr. William Longman was himself an author of no mean acquirements, as is evidenced by his excellent "Lectures on English History" and his "Life of Edward III." He also wrote a monograph on "The Three Cathedrals Dedicated to St. Paul in London," "Suggestions for the Exploration of Iceland," and a privately printed volume descriptive of a "Six Weeks' Tour in Switzerland." Mr. Longman leaves a widow and eight children, one of whom, Mr. C. J. Longman, is engaged in the business, and with his two cousins, sons of Mr. T. Longman, represents in Paternoster Row the fifth generation of the great publishing house.—Our portrait is from a photograph.

THE REV. DR. BLACK.——This enthusiastic young missionary whose career has been so suddenly cut short by fever, was born at Dunbog, in Fifeshire, and educated first at the parish school there under his father, who is still a teacher in the school, and afterwards at Cupar Academy. His training, as well as his abilities, admirably fitted him for the work of the Industrial and Medical Mission, upon which he had so recently entered. Previous to his college career he had gained some experience, first as a joiner, then as an architect, and afterwards as an inspector of works. Having a strong desire to become a missionary he obtained admission as a student to the Glasgow Medical Mission, and at the same time zealously prosecuted a medical course in the Glasgow University, followed by a theological training in Glasgow Free Church College, throwing himself with great ardour into the varied evangelical work in Glasgow. When the second Livingstonia expedition was being organised Dr. Stewart selected Dr. Black, who after the completion of his medical and theological studies, was ordained by the Free Presbytery of Glasgow. The party of which Dr. Black was the leader left this country in May, 1876, and from time to time letters were sent home giving most encouraging accounts of the prospects of the Mission. The climate, however, did not agree with the members, and all suffered more or less from that deadly fever under which Dr. Black at last succumbed, the news of his death having been sent to Cape Town by Dr. Stewart from the Blantyre Mission Station, near Murchison Cataracts.—Our portrait is from a photograph.

FRANCIS GETHLEY MEYRICK, whose death from dysentery was reported in The Times of Monday last, was born in 1855 on Sept. 8th, the very day upon which Sebastopol was taken, so that he was not quite twenty-two years of age. He received his preliminary education at the Temple School, Brighton, and after going through the usual course of professional study, first at Aylesbury, where there is a large County Infirmary, and afterwards at St. George's Hospital, London, he joined the National Society for Aid to the Sick and Wounded in War, and left this country in company with other surgeons on the 23d of June last. Since his arrival at the Seat of War he had been constantly engaged in his work of humanity. Some idea of the dreadful experiences and dangers to which the members of the Red Cross Society are constantly exposed, may be gathered from the account given by The Times correspondent of a raid made upon a Bulgarian village on the 26th of July by some Circassians, who carried off a large number of women alive, and butchered the remainder, who had taken refuge in a church. From that church Mr. Meyrick and three of his companions brought out and buried the bodies of 176 women and children, and while they were thus engaged Mr. Meyrick was deliberately shot at by a cowardly Circassian, who was sneaking behind a hedge. The shot, however, missed, and poor Meyrick's life was spared for the time, alas too soon to be yielded up to that fell disease which will probably claim more victims than will fall by sword or bullet.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

NOTE.——We are informed that our statement last week that the Granville Marina was opened by the Lord Mayor of London was a mistake, the ceremony having been performed by Earl Sydney, K.C.B., the Lord Lieutenant of the County.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——Amongst the most notable political speeches of the week are those of Sir Stafford Northcote to the working men of Plymouth, and Earl Granville at the opening of the Bradford Liberal Club. Sir Stafford contended that the past Session had not been barren, and cited the Universities Act, the Irish Judicature Act, and the Prisons Act, as examples of eminently useful though not sensational legislation. With regard to the War in the East, England's interests were not at present involved, but should they be infringed upon, the Government would be quite prepared to protect them. Lord Granville, too, held it to be impossible for the Government to interfere at the present critical juncture, and said that our duty was to watch the course of events, and to tender our good offices as soon as there was a chance of obtaining peace, which must be based upon self-government for the Christian populations of Turkey. Turning to home politics, he counselled the Liberals of Yorkshire to pay close attention to the work of registration, advocated the assimilation of the county and borough franchise, and protested against the obstructive policy of the Home Rulers. Mr. Forster, who of course was also present at the Bradford gathering, reiterated his belief that this country was far less likely to go to war than was the case in February last.—The Obstructionists continue to take every opportunity of abusing the Government and the House of Commons. Speaking at Leeds on Saturday, Mr. O'Connor Power accused the Government of keeping down the Irish people by brute force, and of throwing dust in the eyes of the English nation; and on Monday at Bradford Mr. O'Connor Power and Mr. Parnell expressed their resolve to continue their policy. Mr. Forster and the British Press came in for a share of blame, and resolutions were passed in favour of Home Rule and the release of the Irish prisoners.—Mr. Gladstone, in thanking the editor of the Northern Ensign for a copy of Mr. Laing's recent speech at Kirkwall, says that he hopes it has received the attention it merits at a time when a good many are bewildered with the combined effects of heat and ignorance.—The Home Rule Convention at Liverpool, under the presidency of Mr. Butt, sat with closed doors, but it was announced that sixty constituencies were represented by delegates, and that Messrs. Parnell, Biggar, O'Donnell, and O'Connor Power were amongst the speakers. Resolutions were passed endorsing the vigorous policy of the party termed "Obstructionists," and calling on the Home Rule League in Ireland to summon a National Conference to settle the lines of future actions.—On Sunday the newly organised "British Association for the Advancement of Freedom" held a meeting in Hyde Park for the purpose of making known its objects, which it seems include free-thought, free-trade, and the solution of the land question by the abolition of all private property in land.—Another new society has been formed for the "Protection of British Interests against Russian Aggression." Lord Stratheden and Campbell is the President, and Mr. Maltman Barry the secretary. The committee have resolved to send a deputation to the Foreign Office at an early date, and to hold a "large public demonstration" upon the subject. The Polish Historical Society in London have forwarded an address to the Bulgarians, reminding them that the Poles also are Slavonians, and that Russia entered Poland as she has entered Bulgaria, professing to come as the friend of religious liberty, and for no selfish object whatever. Many Poles listened to her professions and embraced her assistance no less eagerly than the Bulgarians had done. Russia has declared war against Turkey not for the sake of the Bulgarians but to gain her own ambitions ends; she will seek to annex the country, make it a province of Russia, exact military service, and adopt every measure to convert the Bulgarians into Russians.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE GREEKS.——Under the head of "Extraordinary Correspondence," the Daily Telegraph publishes a statement to the effect that Mr. Gladstone has been writing letters to a Greek merchant, one M. Negroponte, of Constantinople, urging that the Greeks should unite with the Slavs against the Turks. M. Negroponte having replied that the interests of the Greeks were altogether different from those of the Slavs, that the best policy of Greece was rather to fight the Russians than the Turks, and that Greece, if she were wise, would remain tranquil, Mr. Gladstone sent a second letter, very curtly worded, saying that he had given his opinion, and was astonished to find the Christians of the East so disinclined to make common cause against the Mussulmans. This correspondence has been severely commented by several papers, but the only notice that Mr. Gladstone has yet taken of it is contained in a telegram to the Central News, in which he says that he "is not aware of having added in any letter to the opinions on the question at issue which he expressed in the Contemporary Review of last December."

THE INDIAN FAMINE.——The Mansion House Fund for the relief of the famine-stricken people of India had on Wednesday reached the sum of 62,500*l.*, of which 45,000*l.* has already been sent out. Subscriptions are also being made in almost every provincial town throughout the country. It is estimated that half a million natives have already fallen victims to the terrible visitation, and that, whatever may be done, ten times that number will probably be starved to death during the next few months.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Meeting of the Institute of Naval Architects has been held this week at Glasgow, Lord Hampton presiding.—The thirty-fourth annual Congress of the British Archæological Association is this week in session at Llangollen, under the presidency of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn.—General Grant and his wife and son are now in Edinburgh the guests of the Lord Provost.—The Chinese Minister and suite have been paying a visit to Dublin, being shown over the principal institutions of the city by the local authorities.—The storms and floods in Scotland have continued, and have extended to Wales and many parts of England, doing immense damage to crops and other property, and resulting in several instances in the loss of human life.—Two coaching accidents are reported from Scotland. One happened in the pass of Brander, the vehicle being driven over a steep bank, and falling sixteen feet down to the edge of Loch Aire, the other took place between Crieff and Birnam. In both instances several of the passengers were badly injured.—An extraordinary journey was performed last Saturday by a drunken sailor, who laid himself at full length upon the footboard of the Scotch express, and in that perilous position was carried a distance of twelve miles. One of the officials at King's Cross caught sight of him just as the train was leaving the station, and a telegram was sent to Hatfield to stop the train, which otherwise would have gone right on to Peterborough. When the train pulled up he rolled off the footboard unhurt, and on being taken before the magistrates, said that he had no intention of leaving London, but had gone to see some mates off to Glasgow, and the last he remembered was drinking something out of a bottle through the carriage window.—Amongst the deaths announced this week are those of Mr. Henry Rogers, the author of "The Eclipse of Faith," and a frequent contributor to the Edinburgh Review; Mrs. Eunice Bagster (widow of Mr. S. Bagster, the publisher of the Polyglot Bibles), who was 100 years old all but one day; and Miss Sterling Graham of Duntruive, a descendant of Claverhouse, who had attained the age of ninety-six.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——The York meeting, keeping up its character for surprises, is still the talk among Turf men in connection with the second victory of Lady Golightly, who on the last day of the gathering won the Great Yorkshire Stakes in grand style. Lord Falmouth also started Sleipner, and, moreover, declared to win with him; but he was beaten a long way from home, and Lady Golightly, coming to the front, beat Sunray and the rest in a canter. The remark we ventured to make last week as to the possibility of Lord Falmouth supplying both the first and second in the coming Leger seems now to have greater force, for though Silvio is first favourite, the filly is at as short a price as any other animal. It would seem, in reference to the filly's performance in the Great Yorkshire Stakes, that notwithstanding her previous victory in the Yorkshire Oaks, the stable was hardly aware of the improvement she had made since the spring. The Leger seems likely to be a much more interesting race than it has been for many years, as an unusually large number of horses find supporters; and it is not very likely that with Chamant, Plunger, Lord Falmouth's pair, and one or more distinguished "foreigners" in the field a very hot favourite will be made.

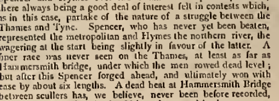
The racing of the present week has only been second class, Sutton Park, Yarmouth, and Oxford being the chief meetings. In fact not a few of the leading members of the Turf, both professional and otherwise, are resting on their oars, and will continue so to do till the great gathering of the clans at Doncaster.

CRICKET.——Kent and Lancashire have played a very close match (return) at Mote Park, Maidstone, the victory remaining with the former by only 1 wicket. The last men in were Mr. Marsham and Lord Harris, and his lordship was vigorously cheered when he made the winning hit and carried out his bat for 33. The Hon. Ivo Bligh played in the Kent Eleven for the first time. Mr. Absolom's 41 in his second innings for the Home county was the highest score made.—The Oval on Saturday last saw the end of intercounty cricket in London for this season, when unfortunately the terribly wet day caused a draw between Yorkshire and Surrey, somewhat in favour of the latter. The Surrey Eleven in their first innings made exactly 300, to which Mr. W. W. Read contributed no less than 140, while Jupp played another of the obstinate inningses for 87. Surrey has played eleven matches this season, winning six, losing two, and drawing three.—Kent has made another winning score, having beaten the Notts men on their own ground at Trent Bridge in one innings with 12 runs to spare. The decline of Nottinghamshire is a marked feature of the season; while Yorkshire also, not long ago almost at the top of the tree, has suffered decline, succumbing as its Eleven did at Scarborough on Wednesday last to I Zingari. Of course it could not have been supposed that Sussex had any chance with Gloucestershire; nor had it, for the victorious Western county won the match at Clifton easily enough by 8 wickets. Dr. E. M. Grace (who was the "original" Grace many seasons ago, and before his brother W. G. was dubbed with the inappropriate title of "Champion") made the highest score in the match, 60 being his first innings figures. He has hardly ever shown in better form than lately.—A novel match was played at Horsham on Wednesday between the Horsham Club and eleven gentlemen of the family and name of Lucas. The Lucases showed themselves most proficient both with bat and ball, one of the party, Mr. A. C. Lucas, putting together 112 runs, while four more scored over 20 each. The Club was defeated in a single innings; but the Horshamites very chivalrously accorded the Lucases an ovation.

Aquatics.——News has come from Australia that Trickett, who beat our Sadler for the Championship of the World more than a year ago, has vanquished his old opponent, Rush, in very easy style. We suppose it may be taken for granted that either Boyd or Higgins, soon after their forthcoming match for the Home Championship, will challenge Trickett. The Australians seem most anxious that we should send our best man to try conclusions with their hero on his own waters, and promise a hearty welcome to our representative.—On Monday last a large number of persons assembled to witness the match between Spencer and Hymes over the Thames Championship Course, there always being a good deal of interest felt in contests which, as in this case, partake of the nature of a struggle between the Thames and Tyne. Spencer, who has never yet been beaten, represented the metropolitan and Hymes the northern river, the wagering at the start being slightly in favour of the latter. A finer race was never seen on the Thames, at least as far as Hammersmith bridge, under which the men rowed dead level; but after this Spencer forged ahead, and ultimately won with ease by about six lengths. A dead heat at Hammersmith Bridge between scullers has, we believe, never been before recorded, and it is strange that it should have happened in the same year as the dead heat at the same spot between Oxford and Cambridge.

Bicycling.——The proprietor of the Sporting Life has offered a magnificent Challenge Cup (of the value of 50 guineas) for long-distance amateur bicyclists. The secretaries of clubs are invited to communicate with the secretary of the London Athletic Club with a view of fixing the distance and date of the race.

Pedestrianism.——The pedestrian Gale, who has performed several wonderful walking feats in which endurance has been the chief feature, is now engaged in walking 1,500 miles in 1,000 hours, doing a mile and a half every hour. The performance is going on at Lillie Bridge under strict supervision, and at the time of making this note Gale was doing his work with apparent comfort. We cannot, however, think that many true sportsmen can approve of these brute-endurance exhibitions.



THEATRES

The Lyceum Theatre reopened on Wednesday for the autumn season with a dramatised version of Mr. Wilkie Collins's novel, "The Dead Secret"—the earliest, and in some respects the best, of the author's long series of fictions. The task of converting this story into a drama has not been undertaken by the author, though the play has Mr. Collins's sanction, nor are we told to whose hands the work has been entrusted. Whoever the dramatist may be, however, he has partly overcome and partly avoided the difficulties of his task with some skill and with no small degree of knowledge of stage effect. He has of necessity got rid of the minor characters and of many of the subsidiary incidents. Thus the Phippens and the Chennerys, the Norburys and the Orriges, have disappeared, and with them have vanished from the story Miss Sturch, the governess, and Captain Treverton, and the Franklands, with the exception of Leonard, who necessarily appears as the husband of Rosamond, but is reduced to the position of a walking gentleman. It is in this way that the dramatist has been enabled to pursue pretty steadily the main line of the story, which lies of course in the promise of Sarah Leeson, solemnly made to her mistress on her death-bed, and in the struggles of conscience, and the sorrowful experiences which follow till they are brought to an end in the revelation of the secret, and the reinstatement of Rosamond in the old home at Porthgenna. After this fashion, which was clearly the only practicable one, The Dead Secret becomes almost a pure melodrama. It is a melodrama, it is true, of a rather gloomy kind, in spite of the somewhat too laboured attempts of the dramatist to extract fun out of the characters of Mr. Munder, the butler, and Mrs. Pentreath, the housekeeper; while, to confirm the general solemnity of tone, a real ghost is introduced, which, like Hamlet's father, appears from time to time to chide the tardy purpose of the unfortunate Sarah Leeson. Of course there can be neither subtlety nor depth in this mode of treatment; but the dramatist's object, that of impressing the imagination of the spectator, and exciting expectation, is undoubtedly attained. In this he would no doubt have succeeded better if he could have avoided a tendency to repeat certain situations, though this is in some degree inseparable from the story. Miss Bateman (Mrs. Crowe) finds in the part of Sarah Leeson abundant opportunities for the exercise of her powerful and touching though somewhat monotonous style of acting. Mr. Odell represents Munder, who becomes on the stage a sort of humble Micawber, with much of the quaint pomposity and tendency to pleonasm of the original, and the part in his hands unquestionably affords amusement. Rosamond is represented in the Prologue by a marvellously clever and interesting child distinguished in the bill as "Little Nelly." The grown-up Rosamond of the subsequent acts is represented by Miss Virginia Francis, who makes a very pretty and vivacious heroine. Uncle Joseph, who is a pleasing person in the novel, becomes on the stage it must be confessed a little tedious. Mr. Clifford Cooper's performance of the misanthropic Andrew Treverton exhibits much feeling for character; as does the representation of his servant Shrowle by Mr. Pinero.

Messrs. James and Thorne call attention to the fact that Our Boys at the Vaudeville Theatre will reach its 850th representation on Wednesday next.

M. Mayer, who managed so ably the long and varied series of French performances at the Gaiety this summer, is stated to be in Paris making arrangements for a series of French Plays in London during the ensuing season. It is not yet known at what theatre these performances will take place.

The play entitled Liz, or that Lass o' Lowrie's, with which the Opera Comique will reopen this evening, is a dramatised version by Mr. Joseph Hatton and Mr. Matthison of a novel dealing with the romance of a miner's life. It has already been performed with success in the country. On the same occasion an original comedietta entitled Married Another, by Mr. Gerald Dixon, will be performed for the first time.

Miss Lydia Foote has been engaged for the leading part in Mr. Byron's new melodrama entitled Guinea Gold, which is to be produced at the reopening of the Princess's Theatre under Mr. Gooch's management.

Miss Lydia Thompson and her company will appear at the Folly Theatre on the 15th inst. The novelties in preparation are a new fanciful opera by Lecocq entitled The Sea Nymph, an operetta by Hervé entitled Up the River, and an opera entitled The Creole by Offenbach.

At the Britannia Theatre Messrs. D. Jacobs and W. J. Wade's annual benefit will take place on Wednesday, the 5th inst., when Esmeralda, or the Hunchback of Notre Dame, will be played.

HOW SOME PEOPLE LIVE

One sunny afternoon in the spring of the present year, the attention of a benevolent gentleman was attracted to a poor fellow who to all appearance was performing an act of kindness towards the pedestrian public deserving of great praise. He carried a large bag over his shoulder, and in his hand a stick with a prong at the end of it, and his business was to hunt for those pieces of orange peel with which careless folk so plentifully bestrew the pavement. Whenever he spied a piece he thrust his spiked stick into it, and so raising it popped it into his bag that already contained a peck or so of the slippery abomination. The benevolent gentleman, in the warmth of his admiration for one who, though manifestly so poor, could devote himself to such a labour of love, accosted the man. "My good fellow," said he, "your disinterested efforts in the interests of humanity do you honour; permit me to beg your acceptance of this half-crown!" The fellow civilly replied that times were too hard for him to think of rejecting such a nice handy sum. "Why, sir," said he, "you'd hardly believe it, I on'y gets fifteen-pence a bushel for it." "For what?" "Why, for the peelin's. Muddy weather or fine weather, that's all I get." The warmth of the gentleman's admiration rapidly cooled as he inquired, "And what is it used for?" "Well, it isn't everybody as knows it," replied the grateful peel gatherer, "but I don't mind telling you. It is used in the cheap confectionery line o' business. They puts it in sugar and makes candied peel of it."

Perhaps it was too much to expect that a private individual, and he a needy one, should, without remuneration, take on himself the performance of a public service; still it was not impossible. The orange peel gatherer might have been a relative of the good old ash sprinkler of Snow Hill. Before the Viaduct at Holborn Valley was contemplated, and Snow Hill was the terror of horses and the aversion of drivers, there was an old woman who lived in one of the neighbouring alleys who, when the slippery weather of winter set in, was always to be found at the street corner with a couple of pails of ashes and cinders, and a small shovel, ready at a moment's notice to do a good turn to a poor horse who had come to a standstill, or been thrown down on the icy slope. Sometimes she got a penny for her pains, but she never asked for it. The Viaduct brought her occupation to an end, and the good old soul has vanished, not, let us hope, to end her days with her grey head strewn with the ashes of poverty.

There are scores of ways, as queer almost as that of the orange peel gatherer, of picking up a living in the streets of London, of which the general public have no more idea than of the domestic economy of the natives of Patagonia. There is at the present time a well-known and worthy member of the London City Missionary Corps, who at one time depended for his bread by making himself useful as a prize-fighter's "dummy." At that time he was a man strong of wind and limb, and blessed with a peculiarly tough constitution, and his business was to permit his pugilistic patrons to "practice" on him. If some rising star of the P.R. introduced a new hit, and an improved method of getting an opponent's head into "chancery," it was of course necessary for other aspirants to test the practicability of the invention, and this they proceeded to do on the person of the unfortunate "dummy," who, as need not be mentioned, was expected to take all the punishment and give none in return. "It wasn't so very bad," the individual in question has been heard to declare, "when they were in their sober senses, and went in for the science of the thing, but I certainly used to find it come rather hard when one or other of them came home drunk about two in the morning, and made me get out of bed to have a few rounds with him."

An "original character" has for many years wandered the streets of London picking up a living, and whose sole claim to public patronage and reward is based on the extraordinary thickness of his skull. His manner of proving the fact is by flinging high up in the air a raw potato of the largest size, and with folded arms and visage raised Ajax-wise, allows the tough missile to strike him full on the forehead. If one chances to meet him in the early morning, it will be seen that he has a full bag of potatoes on his shoulder; should it be evening when he is encountered the bag will be empty, or nearly so, from which it may be fairly inferred that during the intervening eight or nine hours he has been engaged in defying the fracturing properties of raw potatoes as directed from a height against his cranium. He has had the best of it so far, but as is evident at a glance he does not always come off scathless. As a rule the potato may break against the stubborn impediment, and scatter its impotent fragments amongst the lookers-on, but now and then it is a toss up which shall be cracked—skull or potatoe. There are bumps on the man's head as large almost as walnuts, and his crown (the head is quite bald) is bruised and seamy with wounds incurred in the fruitless fray. What on earth can induce the infatuated poor fellow to pursue such a profitless career? He is always in rags, and half-starved looking. He is glad to pick up the larger bits of his smashed potato and put them in his bag, presumably for his supper, when, weary and with a terrible headache, he hurries home to his wretched lodging at night. Possibly he is proud of the achievement, and feels compensated for all his aches and pains, in those proud moments when he gazes round on his gaping audience, and exclaims—holding out a large potato in his hand —"I'll make any person here a present of half-a-crown if he will step into the ring and let the potato fall on his head after I have thrown it up!" His face grows almost radiant when—as is invariably the case—his bold proposal is received with silence. His arm is nerved to throw the potato sky high, and to observe him, scornfully defiant, smiling at the vegetable as it descends is of itself worth sixpence at least.

A curious Relic of Martyrdom is advertised for sale in a Gloucester paper in the following terms: "For disposal, the remnant of the stake to which Bishop Hooper was confined at his martyrdom, and dug up some years since on the spot in St. Mary's Square. For particulars apply," &c. The inhabitants of Gloucester recently erected a monument to Bishop Hooper on the spot where he suffered death.

Scraps

Money Orders are now issued for all ports of France and Algeria, instead of, as heretofore, for a limited number of towns and post offices.

Cremation has extended to Salt Lake City, where, the New York Herald tells us, on July 31 the body of a Dr. C. F. Winslow was duly consumed, the ashes being sent to the grave of his wife, near Boston.

The Patriarch of the Norwegian Mercantile Fleet is now lying at Dieppe—a vessel named the Petrus, which was built in 1784 at Sandefjord, and which has made more than 150 voyages between Norway and various ports of Great Britain and France.

A "Political Axiom" is prominently published in the Paris Figaro which appears to have been the key note of French Ministerial policy during the past few months. "A King may possibly happen to be without intelligence, but a Populace is certain to be imbecile."

The Grosvenor Gallery will be opened in November with a representative exhibition of water colour drawings and studies by deceased masters illustrative of the rise and growth of a branch of art which holds such a distinguished place in the history of the English school.

A University is to be established in Siberia, at Omsk, on the River Irtish, the centre of government for Western Siberia. The scheme was first started by a landowner in 1863, and the chief difficulty has been the choice of a site, the place first proposed—Tomsk—being objected to as it was a penal settlement. The buildings are to be begun at once, and are to be opened in July, 1880.

London Mortality decreased last week, the deaths numbering 1,261, against 1,309 registered during the previous seven days, being 245 below the average, and at the rate of 18·6 per thousand. Deaths from small-pox decreased from 21 to 11, and those from diarrhœa from 194 to 158. Those from measles numbered 29 (a decrease of 20), from scarlet fever 24, from diphtheria 2 (a fall of 10), from whooping-cough 17 (a fall of 1). There were 2,323 births registered—a decrease of 288, being 16 below the average. The mean temperature was 62 deg., or 1·3 deg. above the average, and the duration of sunshine registered was 41·5 hours out of the 98·9 hours that the sun was above the horizon.

The Disagreeables of Travelling in Italy have recently been a warm subject of discussion, but even Italian authorities are marching with the advance of time, according to a correspondent of the Paris Figaro, who has been astonished by having to pay nothing for his letters at the Poste Restante at Rimini. A few years ago he applied for a letter at the same office, and was met by a demand for "Quaranta soldi." "Forty soldi for a letter from Naples?" he exclaimed. "Nonsense; I will give you four." "Twenty, then," replied the postmistress, with a beguiling smile. "No; four," was still the answer. "Ten," then demanded the siren, who, however, ultimately handed over the missive for the sum originally offered with a sigh, remarking, "Ah, indeed, times are bad nowadays."

An amusing Incident of Mr. Toole's recent visit to Northampton is related by the Theatre. A pastry-cook of that town it appears stamped upon the crust of his pork-pies the following announcement:—"Toole in Northampton. Three pieces nightly." One of these pies found its way to the breakfast-table of a water-cure establishment at Malvern, where the hydropathic physician gives written or printed directions each morning to his patients. Some hungry early-risers made an attack upon the pie, and when they left it all that could be seen of the announcement relating to Mr. Toole was "Two—or—three pieces nightly." A dyspeptic invalid came in, and believing that what he read was the doctor's orders, exultingly carried off the remainder of the pie to his bed-room. Hopes of his recovery are entertained.

A curious Story respecting Hobart Pasha is told by May Fair:—"When the ex-British Admiral was at last entrusted with the chief command of the Turkish Fleet, he saw the Sultan, and explained that he could not leave for his post until he had received orders from the Superior Council of War, as otherwise he might again be thwarted by fresh intrigues. The Sultan listened with great attention, and then said, 'But if I give you your instructions, I suppose you will consider them as valuable as those of the Superior Council of War?' 'Naturally, your Majesty!' 'Well,' said Abdul Hamid, drawing a sheet from his pocket, 'here are my instructions, and I wish that you never follow others.' Hobart Pasha, upon reaching the ante-room, opened the paper. It was perfectly blank. The Anglo-Turkish Admiral, in telling this story, laughingly adds, 'My instructions are carte blanche.'"

An Important Notice regarding Telegrams has been issued by the Post Office, which if generally attended to may greatly economise the time of the transmitters and thus ensure the quicker delivery of messages:—"The address of the sender of a telegram is not required for any purposes of signalling, and should be omitted in all cases where the addressee will be able to identify the sender without it. For reference the address should be added at the bottom or on the back of the message form. In sending telegrams firms and public companies should adopt their briefest 'style,' and should avoid the use of stamps containing full name, title, and address. The prefixes 'Mr.' and 'Messrs.' and the affixes 'Esq.,' 'Limited,' &c., should be omitted, as far as possible, in the address of both senders and addressees. Brevity in these respects ensures swifter transmission without any attendant risk."

Cleopatra's Needle.——The proposed site for Cleopatra's Needle has called forth a number of objections, and various suggestions have been made respecting other and more prominent positions for the monument. Of course the great difficulty is the conveyance of the Needle through the streets, and it is for this reason that a river-side site has been most favoured; but could this difficulty be overcome we think that one of the best positions has been suggested by a correspondent, namely, the Kensington Gardens end of Rotten Row, close by the bend of the road. From here the Needle might be seen from a considerable distance, and would be clearly visible from Hyde Park Corner. In the meantime the Needle has now been completely encased in her iron hull at Alexandria, and by last advices was in course of launching. After the vessel has been floated she will be towed to the old harbour in order that her masts, sails, &c., may be fitted.

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The campaign has once more entered an active phase, and the Turkish commanders with the exception of Osman Pasha have almost simultaneously resumed the offensive. The Shipka Pass in particular has been the scene of a fierce struggle since Tuesday, the 21st ult., when, as we reported last week, Suleiman Pasha began a furious attack on the Russian positions. Suleiman commanded some 40,000 troops, while the Russians under General Stoletoff at first had only a force of 13,000 men—subsequently increased to 20,000, and were also placed at a great disadvantage by their exposed positions on a high ridge with valleys on either side, which afforded excellent cover to their assailants. The battle was continued on Wednesday, heavy siege guns being brought up by the Turks, and next day the Russians, outnumbered and weakened by heavy losses, began to give way. The Turks were then on the high road to victory, when a strong Russian reinforcement, under General Radetzky, arrived, and on Friday drove the Turks from the positions they had struggled so hard to win. Suleiman, however, returned to the charge on Saturday, fighting continued till late in the evening, and was renewed on the following days, Suleiman being said to have taken the Russian earthworks on Monday. No definite result had been attained up to the time of writing. Both sides have fought magnificently, and the losses have been correspondingly great. The officers suffered in particular, and one of the principal Russian commanders, General Doroschinsky, who was at Sebastopol, was killed on Saturday.

Meanwhile Mehemet Ali has gained an important success on the Kara Lom. The Russians on Wednesday week crossed the river and attacked the Turks on the Yaslar heights, but failed to rout the enemy. Next day the Turks, led by Salih Pasha, marched on Yaslar, took the village, and forced the Russians back to Sultan Koi, thus securing a strong hold on the eastern bank of the Lom, and the command of the road from Osman Bazar to Rustchuk, and turning the right of the Russian positions. Mehemet Ali has thus at length made a move towards Tirnova, but he is less likely to advance from Yaslar than by the main road from Osman Bazar, which is said to be defended only by one division of the fifth corps. The Russians now occupy Popkoi, five miles south-west of the recent battle field, and two small outpost affairs are reported, while Prince Hassan has gone to Eski Djuma, so an engagement is daily expected. Osman Pasha failed to take Selvi last week, and was compelled to return to Loftcha. There is no fresh news from Plevna, where patient expectation is the order of the day. It is rumoured that the Russian headquarters are to be moved to Bulgareni, and that the Czar is ill and has been recommended to go to Bucharest, while we hear complaints of the heat, of sickness, and of the delays on the Roumanian railways. Reports also are current of the bad state of the food department, a riot having broken out at Sistova in consequence of the soldiers being given musty bread, when 200,000 loaves are said to have been thrown into the Danube. The Russian losses up to the 6th ult. are now officially estimated at 15,500, exclusive of deaths from disease. The mutual bombardment of Rustchuk and Giurgevo continues at intervals, and Widdin and Kalafat have now followed suit, while the Turks have attempted to occupy the island of Canapa, between the two last fortresses, but were repulsed.

Turning to ASIA, Mukhtar Pasha on Friday night advanced against the Russian quarters at Kizil-Tepe, carried the encampment, and next day endeavoured to take Kuruk Dara, but was obliged to rest content with his first conquest. The combat, however, was so far favourable to the Turks that Sir Arnold Kemball considers the Armenian campaign at an end for this year. On the same day there was an engagement near Soubatan, where the Russians were beaten; while on the other hand General Tergukassoff is said to have defeated Ismail Pasha at Igdyr, and to have been reinforced by 12,000 men and forty-eight guns. Dervish Pasha on Friday captured a Russian redoubt at Djianguir. From the fleet we hear of an attempted landing of the Russians at the Sulina mouth of the Danube, and a skirmish between the Royal yacht Livadia and two Turkish monitors.

The atrocity reports have drawn from the various Powers, headed by Germany, a formal remonstrance with Turkey, based upon the Geneva Convention; and the Grand Vizier has announced that every measure shall be taken to prevent excesses, and that a Turkish translation of the Convention shall be circulated among the troops. Ahmed Vefik Pasha has been sent to Adrianople as Governor to inquire into the matter. Fugitives are still pouring into Adrianople, and money and medical assistance are much needed. At CONSTANTINOPLE Mahmoud Damad Pasha has been deposed from the War Ministry, and is replaced by Moustapha Pasha, ex-Governor of Tripoli. The trial of Abdul Kerim and Redif Pasha is not yet over, and the latter is so ill as to be confined at the hospital. From ST. PETERSBURG come fresh rumours of discontent with the conduct of the Generals and of the trial of the Nihilists, while the journals are energetically protesting against the idea of peace under the present reverses.

SERVIA has at last shown her hand, and, at a Ministerial Council at Belgrade on Sunday, war was virtually declared, although the Skuptschina is to be summoned before hostilities are formally announced. The Government wished for a Convention with Russia, but has been told that such formalities are unnecessary amongst "brethren," and Prince Gortschakoff has officially informed Austria that Russia has not incited Servia to take up arms. The troops, 40,000 in number, will be stationed at Saitschar, on the Timok, and in the Morava Valley. Prince Milan might with profit have taken a hint from Prince Charles of Roumania, who has found his co-operation with Russia dear at the price. No benefit has yet accrued to Roumania, the Prince and his troops have been treated in the most cavalier manner, and the people are sorely against the crossing of the army into Bulgaria. A little more courtesy however is now being shown to the Roumanians, and further detachments of the troops have crossed the river at Corabia, under the personal direction of the Prince. GREECE has sent a note to the Porte full of pacific assurances, and offering to co-operate for the suppression of brigandage. Insurrection is rife in Thessaly, which has been declared in a state of siege. AUSTRIA still remains unwilling to interfere, and has been considering the attitude of the Galician Poles, who have at length decided on their address to the Emperor—an address more remarkable for its loyalty than for anything else.

FRANCE.——The decision to prosecute M. Gambetta for his speech at Lille promises to be one of the most fatal errors yet committed by the Marshal's Government. Moderation was the prevailing characteristic of M. Gambetta's oration, which, though naturally criticising the policy of the Ministry, contained no seditious remarks nor personal allusions to the Marshal, save the now famous phrase, Se soumettre ou se démettre. Had the resolve been taken on the morrow of the Lille banquet, the reports of the speech might have been suppressed, but a delay of twelve days has made the address known all over France, and it is difficult to see what advantage the Government can expect from the trial, which will in all probability transform the already popular Young Dictator into a national idol. At a Ministerial Council on Sunday it was decided to proceed against the République Française and the Echo du Nord, a Lille journal, while M. Gambetta will be prosecuted for insults to the Marshal and the Ministry, and for the publication of his speech. M. Gambetta, who was to undergo a preliminary examination at the Palais de Justice yesterday (Friday), is said to be delighted at the prospect of being able to defend himself. The Français, the Duc de Broglie's organ, however, declares that the trial will take place before the Correctional Tribunal at Lille about the 15th inst., and that the proceedings will be kept private so that M. Gambetta will thus lose a magnificent opportunity of giving his opinions to the country. The wonder created by this step on the part of statesmen like MM. De Broglie and De Fourtou will be considerably lessened if the motives attributed to the Premier by The Times' correspondent prove correct—that the Duc instigated the prosecution with the intention of keeping M. Gambetta out of office should the elections necessitate a Cabinet being formed from the Left, as the Marshal could not give a portfolio to a man who had been convicted of insulting him. The penalties for an insult to the Ministry are a fine of from 1*l.* to 80*l.*, and imprisonment varying from five days to a year, those for attacks on the President a fine between 4*l.* and 200*l.*, and imprisonment between a month and three years, or for attacking his constitutional rights a fine between 12*l.* and 240*l.*, and imprisonment from three months to five years. The Republicans express unanimous satisfaction at the idea of the trial, the Liberal press thank the Government for rendering the Republican cause a great service, and the France demands a similar prosecution. The Conservative journals make no comment on the affair, and only the Ultramontane and Imperialist organs defend the measure.

Meanwhile the Marshal is determined on a Southern tour, although now he will not go to St. Etienne, and every effort is being made to give him a warm reception at Bordeaux. He will leave Paris on Thursday next, will be present at some military manœuvres next day, and on Saturday go on to Bordeaux, while on Monday he will visit Perigueux, returning to Paris by Angoulême, Poitiers, Tours, and Riberac. Some discontent is felt in Government quarters with England for not having sent any vessel to salute the Marshal at Cherbourg, as two ironclads greeted M. Thiers when he visited Havre in 1872. The Deputy-Mayor of Evreux, who was so injudicious as to speak plain truths to the Marshal has been dismissed.

M. Thiers, who is at St. Germain, has received a deputation, and assured them of his belief in a Republic; M. Christophle, one of the late Ministry, speaking at an agricultural banquet, has severely blamed the Government for attempting to stifle the voice of the country; M. Renault has expressed his opinion that Marshal MacMahon will not be guilty of a definite violation of the Constitution; and at Neuvic M. de Fourtou has been defending the Ministry. Most of the Councils-General have closed their sittings, and the others have adjourned; while it is significant that the Republicans have been entirely successful in the Councils. The Liberal orations are not, however, to go unchecked, and three fresh prosecutions are announced, two of the victims belonging to the 363. The election committees are hard at work, and Père Hyacinthe is announced to be one of the candidates. The Ducrot incident has ended in the condemnation of the Figaro writer, M. Bucheron, or St. Genest, to thirty days' military confinement. M. Bucheron is a lieutenant in the Reserve, and thus comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of War, who has punished his subordinate for an attack on his superior officer.

Paris is beginning to awake for her autumn season, and the theatres are fast reopening. The Patti trial is once more on the tapis, and Madame Patti has sued her husband for nullity of marriage, alleging that the priest who performed the ceremony was not properly licensed; a hospital for English subjects has been opened by Sir Richard Wallace; there has been a grand theatrical representation in aid of the Russo-Turkish wounded; and Trente Ans, ou la Vie d'un Joueur has been revived at the Cluny. In the provinces the harvest is stated to be satisfactory in forty-seven departments, and unsatisfactory in forty-one, storms and floods have occurred in the south, and the Lourdes pilgrimages have resulted in twenty asserted miracles.

ITALY.——The Pope is again reported to be seriously ill, being prostrated by the excessive heat. He is continually drowsy, and can barely give his attention to business, while a Camarilla acts in his name. The Voce della Verità of course denies the rumour, and chronicles various audiences given by Pius IX. The Cardinals however are holding meetings, and a Bull regulating the proceedings on the death of His Holiness has been drawn up, empowering Cardinal Camerlengo either to summon the Conclave of Cardinals immediately, or to wait for the arrival of the foreign dignitaries. Cardinal Bizzari, who was Secretary to Pius VIII., is dead.

UNITED STATES.——President Hayes has been visiting Worcester and Concord, and has been warmly received. His election has been denounced by the Pennsylvania Democrats, who, however, approve his Southern policy. The Canadian Treaty continues to be much discussed, and the National Board of Trade at Milwaukee have asked the President to recommend the creation of a Commission from Congress to negotiate a Reciprocal Treaty. The Nez Percés Indians have attacked two parties of settlers, killing sixteen.—American mechanics have been warned by the United States Consul at Liverpool against coming to England in search of work.

INDIA.—The Viceroy is now in Madras, and the famine reports continue most distressing. Eight millions have already been spent in Madras, where the present expenditure is half a million per month, while it is calculated that 500,000 persons have perished within the last six months, and that 1,500,000 are now receiving relief. Should the October rains fail the famine will last till August. Rolling stock is being lent to the Madras Railway, where there is a grain block, and a correspondent mentions that bags of rice are lying spoiling on the beach. The Bengal Government has held a meeting to decide on help for Madras, but has been snubbed by the Supreme Government, which states that it does not wish an appeal to private charity at present. In other parts of India the accounts are a little more encouraging, and the Bombay famine is being dealt with successfully and quietly.—The Krishna Shoal Lighthouse has been carried away in a storm.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Rubens fêtes in BELGIUM closed on Monday with a regatta on the Scheldt and the performance of a cantata.—In GERMANY a monument commemorating Prince Bismarck's famous utterance, "We will not go to Canossa," has been unveiled at Bismarckstein, on the highest peak of the Burgberg, the site of the Emperor Henry IV.'s castle. Prince Bismarck was invited, but he has gone to Gastein, and could not attend. The Prince has told a Leipsic official that his health is exhausted, and that his sleeplessness returns when he has worked for some hours.—A telegraph line to Tientsin has been erected in CHINA.—In AUSTRALIA the Melbourne Parliament has opened, and the plans for the defence of the colony will shortly be presented. The yield of gold in Victoria during 1876 was 100,000 ounces below that of the previous year. New South Wales is taking up the Chinese question, and has recommended the restriction of the immigration by the English Government.—Sir Bartle Frere is on a tour in the Eastern provinces of SOUTH AFRICA, and a Bill has been passed authorising the loan of 175,000*l.* to pay the debts of West Griqualand.

THE COURT

HER MAJESTY, with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, duly arrived at Balmoral at the close of last week, and has since taken her usual walks and drives about the neighbourhood. On Sunday Divine Service was performed at the Castle by the Rev. A. Campbell, of Crathie, the Queen and the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold being present. Sunday also was the anniversary of the birthday of the late Prince Consort, and at noon on the following day Prince Leopold, the Gentlemen-in-Waiting on the Queen and Royal Family, and the servants and tenants of the Royal estates, assembled at the Obelisk and drank to the Prince's memory. Sir William Jenner is attending upon Prince Leopold at Balmoral, and the Right Hon. Gathorne Hardy arrived at the Castle on Monday as Minister in attendance on the Queen.

Prince Albert Victor of Wales is now perfectly convalescent, and on Saturday, together with the Princess of Wales, left London for Cowes, being met at Portsmouth by the Prince of Wales and Prince George, the whole party subsequently crossing the Solent in the Osborne. The Prince of Wales intends at the next meeting of the Grand Lodge of Freemasons on September 5 to move for a vote of 200 guineas for the sufferers by the fire at St. John's, New Brunswick, and of 100 guineas to alleviate the distress caused by the tidal wave on the coast of Peru. A vote of 1,000 guineas towards the Indian Famine Relief Fund will also be moved.

The King of Denmark returned to his own country yesterday week, the Princess of Wales seeing him off at Charing Cross Railway Station. It is stated that his sudden journey to London was undertaken at the express desire of the young Prince Albert Victor of Wales. The Queen and Princess Thyra are still in Germany, and there is yet another rumour that the latter is betrothed—this time to the ex-Crown Prince of Hanover.—Another rumoured Royal engagement is the betrothal of the King of Spain to the Princess Mercedes of Montpensier. The King's sister, the Princess of the Asturias, has been suffering from measles.—The Duke of Edinburgh is visiting Athens.—The ex-Empress Eugenie and her son are staying at West Cowes.—The Emperor of Brazil has been visiting Madrid and Lisbon.

CHURCH NEWS

CARDINAL CULLEN has issued a pastoral, in which after exhorting the faithful to pray for fine weather, he says that sin and iniquity now abound in the world, that Atheism is preached every day, and defended in the columns of infidel newspapers and reviews without let or hindrance, that the name of God is openly blasphemed, that the doctrines and practices of the Church of Christ are scoffed at with impunity, that in order to spread infidelity attempts are made to bring up children without religion and to banish God from the school, and that some statesmen and politicians proclaim that Providence takes no part in the management of this world, and that its action is not to be taken into consideration or referred to when there are questions of political or earthly matters. Whilst God is thus offended we have reasons to fear that in addition to the war, the famine, and pestilence with which the world is now afflicted, He will send still more dreadful scourges to punish infidels and sinners.

VARIOUS.——At the annual meeting of the Meath Protestant Orphan Society, held last week at Kells, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was one of the speakers, said that he could not understand the statement made by some Irish papers that he had supported the Irish Church Disestablishment Bill in the House of Lords. He had not even voted for it, and he should not have been more astonished had he been accused of murder. It was untrue that English Churchmen generally were not interested in the Church of Ireland. Free intercourse in past times had resulted in mutual benefit, and he trusted that it would do so in the future.—The John Bull is informed that the Church Association is about to prosecute the Rev. C. F. Lowder, vicar of St. Peter's, London Docks, for Ritualistic practices. It is added that Mr. Lowder will resist the judgment of Lord Penzance, and that the dockmen and other labourers of the parish are "prepared to fight it out with any mob that may gather there."—The Committee of the additional Home Bishoprics Endowment Fund have sent a memorial to Her Majesty advocating the assignment of a portion of the revenues of St. Katherine's Hospital to an Endowment Fund for a Bishopric for East London.—Last Sunday Dean Stanley preaching in Westminster Abbey from the text "Who is my neighbour?" referred to the suffering by the war in the East, and by the Indian Famine, as affording scope for the exercise of Christian duty and love. There was a horrible old proverb, "Homo homini lupus," which might almost now be altered into "Homo homini Dæmon," but which on our parts we should endeavour to change into "Homo homini Deus," by conveying to those in dire need Christian, Godlike aid, and remission from suffering.—An "Indignant Protestant," writing to the Echo, gives an account of an "Eastern Bazaar" which was held recently at Folkestone, at which the Rev. E. Husband, of St. Michael's Church, exhibited, amongst other articles brought from Palestine, "pieces of the root of the old tree of agony in the Garden of Gethsemane; of the tree under which the infant Saviour and the Virgin Mary rested in the course of their flight into Egypt; of the tomb of Christ, and the manger in which Christ was born."—The custodian of the Bodleian Library at Oxford has given offence to an undergraduate of the University by refusing to allow him to read "The Priest in Absolution." He has accordingly written to the papers complaining of the matter, and Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers has published a reply pointing out that it is the duty of the librarians to prevent the improper use of books which are not perhaps treasures in the proper sense of the word, but forms of literature which, for obvious reasons, the Bodleian is bound to possess and keep. As to the student's plea that he was reading for Holy Orders, the Professor remarks that in his opinion the study of such a book would not put a candidate for Orders in a particularly favourable light with any Bishop.—The Tablet announces that His Holiness intends soon to restore the Hierarchy to Scotland, and that the Vicars-Apostolic of that country have been requested to deliberate upon the subject and report to the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda.—Canon Carter has addressed a second letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, urging the value of private confession, and expressing his surprise that the Bishops do not welcome its revival, and especially that they object to publicity and other safeguards against popular abuse.—The Bishop of Lincoln has written to a clergyman in his diocese, rebuking him for having refused to church a woman after childbirth because she was a Dissenter.—The new Bishop of Sodor and Man, the Rev. Rowley Hill, was consecrated on Friday last in York Minster, the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of Durham, Rochester, and Chester taking part in the service. The "enthronement" took place on Tuesday in St. Mary's, Castletown, in presence of an immense congregation.—The Rev. J. W. Horsley, chaplain to the Middlesex House of Detention, has written to the magistrates announcing that he has, "with much regret," resigned his connection with the Holy Cross Society, in deference to the kindly influence and advice of his Bishop. He adds that because he is a High Churchman out of the prison it by no means follow, nor is it the case, that he is such in prison.—Who is the Rev. Thomas Jones, and in what way has he offended the Bishop of Melbourne and the Australian Churchman? The prelate has, it appears, declined to attend a service of welcome held in Mr. Jones's honour, and the editor of the paper declares that his refusal "will do more to secure the confidence and sympathy of his co-Churchmen in Australia than anything that he has ever previously said or done."

MADAME ADELINA PATTI.——The report that Madame Patti has retired, or intends retiring, to the Convent of the "Sacré Cœur," with the purpose of "taking the veil," is, like so many other reports about this celebrated artist, what the French term a canard, and the English a "hoax."

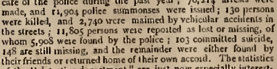
THE MUSICAL FESTIVALS.——The Festival of the Three Choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, is to be held next week at the last-named city. Our readers have already been made acquainted with the programme, the only change in which is the substitution of Mdlle. Albani for Mdlle. Titiens, whose co-operation we long since declared to be improbable. After the interval of a week comes the festival at Leeds, with an important novelty in the shape of a new oratorio, founded on the Biblical story of Joseph, from the pen of Professor Macfarren. At Leeds, also, Mdlle. Albani will sing the music originally set down for Mdlle. Titiens. Mr. Walter Cecil Macfarren is to direct the performance of Joseph—which, remembering that Sir Michael Costa is engaged, and that he conducted St. John the Baptist, Professor Macfarren's first oratorio, both at the Bristol Festival and at our London Exeter Hall, appears somewhat strange. In one of the programmes the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's beautiful overture, The Wood Nymph, is a feature. Will that be confided to the tender care of M. Sainton? We see, too, that the performance of Mr. Walter Austin's dramatic cantata, The Fire King, is to be directed by his instructor, Mr. Thomas Wingham, of the Royal Academy of Music; so that Sir Michael Costa's responsibilities on this occasion can hardly be termed "onerous."

ALEXANDRA PALACE.——What Mr. Weist Hill, "our English Costa," as he has not been inaptly styled, is doing for the cause of good music at the Alexandra Palace may be gathered from the programme of the last Friday "Vocal and Instrumental Concert." This comprised the three orchestral movements from Beethoven's Symphony in D minor—the colossal "No. 9;" a minuet by Boccherini, nicknamed by the celebrated violinist, Puppo, (characteristically enough), the "Wife of Haydn;" and Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream—from the overture to the Wedding March. The general execution, by the fine band which Mr. Hill controls like an experienced commander, was all that could be wished. Rarely have the "scherzos" of Beethoven and Mendelssohn—so different in conception, yet each after its manner incomparable—been played with more uniform spirit, delicacy, and precision. They were, moreover, listened to with decorous attention and applauded according to their worth. Mr. Percy Blandford sung "Adelaide," accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Henry Leipold; the two-part song, "Ye spotted snakes," in the Midsummer Night's Dream, was confided to Miss Fanny Perfitt and Mrs. Hutchings; and a pretty trio for female voices ("Once I heard a little voice"), the composition of Mr. Westbrook, was sung by the ladies of the Alexandra Palace Choir.

THE LATE HECTOR BERLIOZ.——M. Daniel Bernard, of the Paris journal L'Union, is preparing a book entitled "Correspondence d'Hector Berlioz," to be published next winter at Lévy's. M. Bernard solicits all those who may have preserved letters of interest from the renowned French composer and feuilletoniste to send him forthwith either the originals or copies. Any amateurs or musicians in England (and there are not a few) who possess such treasures, bearing in mind the style in which Mendelssohn's correspondence has been "edited," will be chary about parting with them. If a man of genius is to be known by his letters, those letters should be produced en gros, intact, and without prejudice; otherwise the outside world is guided to a necessarily imperfect estimate. Berlioz was much more freely outspoken than Mendelssohn, and far less initiated in the ways of the world. His correspondence, therefore, if non-manipulated, would be doubly valuable. About disclosures of intimate family sympathies, relationships, and so forth, only the inquisitively prying can be curious. There are a great deal too many such in the two volumes of Mendelssohn's published letters; but the opinions of distinguished men on questions relating to an art the practice of which has brought them eminence are of the utmost interest and importance. An ungarbled correspondence from the pen of Berlioz would be a real acquisition—a garbled one little better than useless. Whoever, then, commits letters signed "Berlioz" to the custody of M. Daniel Bernard should stipulate, as a sine quâ non, that they be published without curtailment, verbatim et literatim, or returned to the owner. Otherwise they might possibly be modified, or somehow tampered with—"best intentions," taken for granted.

AGRICULTURAL HALL.——Madame Liebhart has commenced a series of grand promenade concerts in the Agricultural Hall, Islington, the large building being temporarily transformed into a beautiful garden by the display of 10,000*l*. worth of choice flowers, fruits, and foliage plants. The musical arrangements, which are under the direction of Mr. F. Kingsbury, include vocal and orchestral effects, a long list of well known singers being engaged, amongst whom are Madame Anna Bishop, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Maybrick. The solos, however, whether vocal or instrumental, can scarcely be heard in the vast building, whose acoustic properties are not of the best, and the pièce de résistance is decidedly the British Army Quadrilles, in which 250 performers, in the national costumes of France, Germany, Russia, and Turkey take part.

WAIFS.——The Paris Ménestrel informs its readers that Madame Adelina Patti has signed a treaty with her brother-in-law, M. Maurice Strakosch, as entrepreneur for all her future European engagements, America being left out of the question.—Mr. Carl Rosa's last week in Dublin was his most successful. The company are now at Hull.—The fifth annual report of Mr. John Hullah, Inspector of Music at the students' examination in the training schools of Great Britain, has recently been issued. In spite of a grumble or so, more especially on the subject of musical instruction in elementary schools (which ought to be the legitimate foundation of all), the accomplished professor takes a hopeful view of the object contemplated, to which he, perhaps more than any other man in this country, has given an impetus.—Dr. Edouard Hanslick, the eminent Viennese critic, has published a very interesting analysis of the genius and artistic acquirements of Adelina Patti.—After the termination of her engagement at Brussels, there is every probability that Miss Minnie Hauk will sing at the Italian Opera in Paris. The reputation of this gifted young American spreads far and wide.—The sudden death by apoplexy of the highly esteemed Capellmeister Fischert, his colleague, Herr Bott, having resigned not long since, leaves the Royal Theatre at Hanover without a musical director, just too as the season is about to begin. Herr Fischert succeeded the well-known Heinrich Marschner in the post.—We are not at all surprised that a monument is being erected in memory of Gossec at Vergnies (Canton de Beaumont), where he was born. Gossec was a kind of Vanhall and Kotzwara in one, doing something in his way for the orchestral symphony while Mozart was but a boy, though far behind Haydn, and inferior even to Ignace Pleyel.—Mr. Gye, of the Royal Italian Opera, we are pleased to learn, has entirely recovered from a somewhat protracted indisposition. He is now, we believe, in Scotland.



THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.——Colonel Henderson's annual report, just issued, speaks with satisfaction of the general conduct of the members of the force. Out of a total strength of 10,268 constables and officers there have been during the past year 172 dismissals and 229 "compulsory resignations;" 14 men have been charged before magistrates, and 12 of these have been convicted. On the other hand, 112 men have been specially commended or rewarded by judges and magistrates, and 1,101 have received rewards from the Commissioners for special good services. No fewer than 2,941 police officers were assaulted, many of the assaults being of a serious character. More than 36 miles of new streets, with 12,938 new houses, have been handed over to the care of the police during the past year; 76,214 arrests were made, and 11,904 police summonses were issued; 130 persons were killed, and 2,740 were maimed by vehicular accidents in the streets; 11,805 persons were reported as lost or missing, of whom 5,908 were found by the police; 103 committed suicide, 148 are still missing, and the remainder were either found by their friends or returned home of their own accord. The statistics of the "detective department" are just now especially interesting. The number of officers is 218, and last year they arrested 5,175 persons, of whom 3,244 were convicted. Their duties comprehend inquiries respecting offences committed within the metropolitan district and elsewhere; and "inquiries of a varied nature for Government departments," including questions of nationality, and coining cases, besides "miscellaneous inquiries for foreign Governments and police," and "inquiries respecting missing and insane persons," murder or death under suspicious circumstances, incendiary fires, and matters "not included under these heads," in addition to all which, they have to attend race meetings and other public gatherings.

A NOVEL TRICK.——The other day a letter was sent to the papers by a Bond Street jeweller cautioning the public against the proceedings of an "artful dodger" who was victimising the public by delivering parcels of worthless sham jewellery and demanding payment for "repairs," representing that the article came from the Bond Street firm. The perpetrator of these frauds has since been caught in a very singular manner, having literally walked into the lion's mouth by trying the trick at the house of a detective of the C Division when that officer happened to be at home. He was of course arrested, and has now been committed for trial. A book of receipts was found in his possession, from which it appeared that money had been obtained in this way from a large number of noblemen and gentlemen, amongst whom was the Right Hon. Robert Lowe.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Some account of the last week's proceedings at Bow Street in the case of the alleged police conspiracy will be found in "Our Illustrations" column. On Tuesday the Dover Watch Committee received a statement from Detective Walker relative to the accusation made against him by the convict Kurr, but the consideration of the case was deferred on the suggestion of the Treasury Solicitor. The Town Clerk is reported to have made the extraordinary remark that he was not aware that it was an offence for a constable to receive a bribe.—A youth belonging to the Akbar reformatory ship, now lying in the Mersey, has been committed for trial on a charge of setting fire to the vessel. Three fires were simultaneously discovered on the orlop deck on Friday last, and the prisoner had been seen just previously with some grease and rags near the spot. It appears that he had recently been flogged for some offence, and had remarked to another lad that he would make all on board suffer for it.—Several supposed incendiary fires have recently taken place in Blackburn, and a man named Murray was last week arrested on suspicion. There was not, however, sufficient evidence to connect him with the events, but he was sent to prison for a year for evading police supervision inflicted for a former offence.—Three men in the employ of the Brighton Railway Company are in custody on a charge of plundering goods trains. Large quantities of missing property were found at each of their houses.—The Brighton magistrates have committed a female swindler for trial on three separate charges of obtaining goods from tradesmen by falsely representing that she was in the service of Lady Wellesley, who is now staying in the town.—Two lads, aged respectively thirteen and fourteen, were the other day charged with obtaining a horse and cart by false pretences. It seems that they had borrowed them for the purpose of taking a country drive, and when they came back at night they were given into custody. The magistrate, however, held that it was only a boyish freak, and that there had been no infringement of the Act, which contemplated the making of a profit by the false pretences, so that the lads were lucky enough to get off with a reprimand.

AN ALBERT HALL is to be built at Jeypore in commemoration of the Prince of Wales' visit, and the designs have just been submitted to the Maharajah.

EVEN THE NOBLE REDSKIN appears to have caught the anti-Chinese feeling now prevalent, and when recently two Celestial belles were walking down a street in a Western city, two young Washoe squaws met and confronted the moon-eyed ladies. The elder redskin spoke as follows: "You bad China; you no good; you all same monkey in circus; you no got him hair; you all tail; you put on him airs; all same white mehala; you get him off in street pretty quick; me Indian; me 'Merican, and me put a head on you monkey." The Celestials did not brave the wrath of the copper-coloured barbarians, but beat a precipitate retreat.

THE INTEREST which has been excited concerning the subject of Home Hospitals for the well-to-do is an indication of the necessity of provision of hospital accommodation for the middle class, and for no class of patients is this so much required as for those suffering from infectious disease. The fact that the members of a family are exposed to risk of life through one of their number suffering from an infectious malady is the strongest necessity that can arise for the removal of the invalid from his home. Not that this idea is in the least novel, as the London Fever Hospital at Islington has for some time past provided private rooms for those who cannot be treated in their own homes with safety to others, and who are unwilling to be treated in the general wards of a pauper hospital. In these rooms patients not only have the advantage of the visits of eminent physicians, but have the constant attendance of the resident medical officers and skilled nurses. Here they can pass through their illness without the slightest risk of infecting others, while enjoying themselves special facilities for recovery. The authorities of this Hospital have devoted much care to the arrangements of these rooms in order that patients may not lose home comforts through their removal to hospital; and further, by the collection of a library and improvements to the garden, have done everything in their power to render the residence there of a patient as pleasant as possible. The increasing demand for the private rooms is a proof of the willingness of the public to avail themselves of these advantages, and it is felt that this accommodation has only to be known to be more generally utilised. The small charge of three guineas a week is far less than the expense a fever patient incurs in his own home, and seeing that we have thus for some time had among us a home hospital for infectious diseases which has proved an undoubted success, we have every reason to believe that this principle can be equally well extended to persons suffering from other diseases by the establishment of general hospitals for the well-to-do.

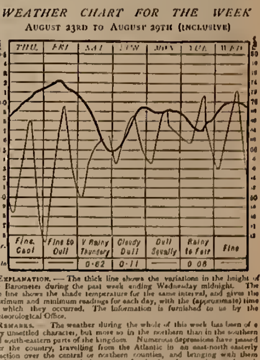
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

AUGUST 23RD TO AUGUST 29TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather during the whole of this week has been of a very unsettled character, but more so in the northern than in the southern and south-eastern parts of the kingdom. Numerous depressions have passed over the country, travelling from the Atlantic in an east-north easterly direction over the central or northern counties, and bringing with them south westerly winds and showers to England and easterly winds with rain to Scotland and Ireland. The weather on Saturday, the 25th instant, was very remarkable, a depression advancing from the southward to the mouth of St. George's Channel by [illegible] p.m., and then changing its course and moving eastward till it reached the North Sea by Monday morning, the 27th instant. Easterly winds and heavy rain fell in England on Saturday, the 25th instant, but the wind veered to the west in the course of the night. The barometer was highest (30.22 inches) on Friday, the 24th instant; lowest (29.48 inches) on Saturday night, the 25th instant; range, 0.74 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (78°) on Wednesday, the 29th instant; lowest (41°) on Friday, the 24th instant, when a slight frost occurred on the grass; range, [illegible]. Rainfall: total fall, 0.81 inch, on three days; greatest fall, 0.62 inches, on Saturday, the 25th instant.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE QUEEN'S BASTION

TWO boys and a girl, standing together in the north-west corner of the Queen's Bastion on the old town wall.

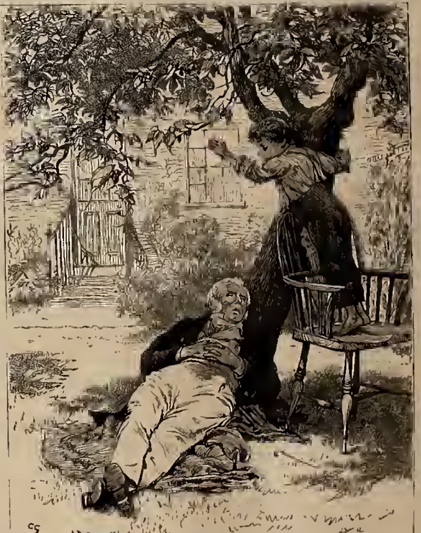
Leonard, the elder boy, leans on an old-fashioned 32-pounder which points through an embrasure, narrow at the mouth and wide at the end, straight up the harbour.

Should any enemy attempt to cross the lagoon of mud which forms the upper harbour at low tide, that enemy would, as Leonard often explained, be "raked" by the gun. Leonard is a lad between seventeen and eighteen, tall, and well-grown. As yet his figure is too slight, but that will fill out; his shoulders are broad enough for the strength a year or two more will give him; he has short brown hair of quite a common colour, but lustrous, and with a natural curl in it; his eyes are hazel, and they are stedfast; when he fought battles at school those eyes looked like winning; his chin is strong and square; his lips are firm. Only to look upon him as he passed you would say that you had seen a strong man in his youth. People turned their heads after he had gone by to have another look at such a handsome boy.

He leans his back, now, against the gun, his hands resting lightly upon the carriage, on either side as if to be ready for immediate action; his straw hat lies on the grass beside him. And he is looking in the face of the girl.

She is a mere child of thirteen or fourteen, standing before him and gazing into his face with sad and solemn eyes. She, too, is bareheaded, carrying her summer hat by the ribbons. I suppose no girl of fourteen, when girls are bony, angular, and big-footed, can properly be described as beautiful, but Celia was always beautiful to me. Her face remains the same to me through the changes of many years; always lovely, always sweet and winsome. Her eyes were light blue and yet not shallow; she had a pair of mutinous little lips which were generally, but not to-night, laughing; her hair hung over her shoulders in the long and unfettered tresses which so well become young maidens; and in her cheek was the prettiest little dimple ever seen. But now she looked sad, and tears were gathered in her eyes.

As for me, I was lying on the parapet of the wall, looking at the other two. Perhaps it will save trouble if I state at once who I was, and what to look upon. In the year 1853 I was sixteen years of age, about two years older than Celia, nearly two years younger than Leonard. I believe I had already arrived at my present tall stature, which is exactly five feet one inch. I am a hunchback. An accident in infancy rounded my shoulders and arched my back, giving me a projection which causes my coats to hang loosely where other men's fit tight, forcing my neck forward so that my head bends back where other people's heads are held straight upon their necks. It was an unfortunate accident, because I should, but for it, have grown into a strong man; my limbs are stout and my arms are muscular. It cost me nothing as a boy to climb up ropes and posts, to clamber hand over hand along a rail, to get up into trees, to do anything where I could get hold for a single hand, or for a single foot. I was not, through my unlucky back, the distortion of my neck, and the length of my arm, comely to look upon. All the years of my childhood and some a good deal later were spent in the miserable effort to bring home to myself the plain fact that I was disgracié. The comeliness of youth and manhood could be no more mine than my father's broad lands. For besides being a hunchback, I was an exile, a Pole, the son of a Polish rebel, and therefore penniless. My name is Ladislas Pulaski.



The unprincipled young robber, after quite realising the position of things—strange garden—gentleman of marine calling sound asleep—ripe fruit—present thirst—overwhelming curiosity to ascertain if this kind of fruit resembled apples—yielded without resistance to temptation, and mounted the chair.

We were standing, as I said, in the north-west corner of the Queen's Bastion, the spot where the grass was longest and greenest, the wild convolvulus most abundant, and where the noblest of the great elms which stood upon the ramparts—"to catch the enemy's shells" said Leonard—threw out a gracious arm laden with leafy foliage to give a shade. We called the place Celia's Arbour.

If you looked out over the parapet, you saw before you the whole of the most magnificent harbour in the world, and if you looked through the embrasure of the wall you had a splendid framed picture—water for foreground, old ruined castle in middle distance, blue hill beyond, and above blue sky.

We were all three silent, because it was Leonard's last evening with us. He was going away, our companion and brother, and we were there to bid him God speed.

It was after eight; suddenly the sun, which a moment before was a great disc of burnished gold, sank below the thin line of land between sky and sea. Then the evening gun from the Duke of York's Bastion proclaimed the death of another day with a loud report which made the branches in the trees above us to shake and tremble. And from the barracks in the town; from the Harbour Admiral's flagship; from the Port Admiral's flagship; from the Flagship of the Admiral in command of the Mediterranean Fleet, then in harbour; from the tower of the old church, there came such a firing of muskets, such a beating of drums, playing of fifes, ringing of bells, and sounding of trumpets, that you would have thought the sun was setting once for all, and receiving his farewell salute from a world he was leaving for ever to roll about in darkness.

The evening gun and the tintamarre that followed roused us all three, and we involuntarily turned to look across the parapet. Beyond that was the moat, and beyond the moat was a ravelin, and beyond the ravelin the sea-wall. Beyond the wall a smooth and placid lake, for it was high tide, four miles long and a couple of miles wide, in which the splendour of the west was reflected so that it looked like a furnace of molten metal. At low tide it would have been a great flat level of black mud, unlovely even with an evening sky upon it, intersected with creeks and streams which, I suppose, were kept full of water by the drainage of the mud banks. At the end of the harbour stood the old ruined castle, on the very margin and verge of the water. The walls were reflected in the calm bosom of the lagoon; the water-gate opened out upon the wavelets of the lapping tide; behind rose the great donjon, square, grey, and massive; in the tourney-yard stood the old church, and we needed no telling to make us think of the walls behind, four feet broad, rugged and worn by the tooth of Time, thickly blossoming with gilly-flowers, clutched and held on all sides by the tight embrace of the ivy. There had been rain in the afternoon, so that the air was clear and transparent, and you could see every stone in the grand old keep, every dentation of the wall. Behind the castle lay the low curved line of a long hill, green and grassy, which made a background to the harbour and the old fortress. It stretched for six miles, this hill, and might have been monotonous but for the chalk quarries which studded its side with frequent intervals of white. Farther on, to the west, there lay a village, buried in a great clump of trees, so that you could see nothing but the tower of a church and the occasional smoke of a chimney. The village was so far off that it seemed like some outlying fort, an advance work of civilisation, an outpost such as those which the Roman conquerors have left in the Desert. When your eye left the village among the trees and travelled southwards, you could see very little of land on the other side by reason of the ships which intervened,—ships of every age, of every class, of every colour, of every build. Frigates, three-deckers, brigs, schooners, cutters, launches, gun-boats, paddle-wheel steamers, screw steamers, hulks so old as to be almost shapeless,—they were lying ranged in line, or they were moored separately; some in the full flood of the wasting sunset, some in shadow, one behind the other, making deep blacknesses in the golden water. There was not much life, at this late hour, in the harbour. Here and there a boat pulled by two or three lads from the town; here and there a great ship's gig, moving heavily through the water, pulled by a crew of sailors, rowing with their slow and measured stroke, and the little middy sitting in the stern; or perhaps a wherry coming down from Fareham Creek. But mostly the harbour was silent, the bustle even at the lower end having ceased with the sunset.

"What do you see up the harbour, Leonard?" asked the girl, for all of us were gazing silently at the glorious sight.

"I am looking for my future, Cis, and I cannot make it out."

"Tell us what you think, Leonard."

"Five minutes ago it looked splendid. But the glory is going off the water. See, Cis, the Castle has disappeared—there is nothing to be made out there, but a low black mass of shade; and the ships are so many black logs lying on grey water that in ten minutes will be black too. Nothing but blackness. Is that my future?"

"I can read you a better fortune out of the sunset than that," I interposed.

"Do, Laddy," said Celia. "Don't let poor Leonard go away with a bad omen."

"If you look above you, Leonard," I went on, "you will see that all the splendours of the earth have gone up into the heavens. Look at the brightness there. Was there ever a more glorious sunset? There is a streak of colour for you—the one above the belt of salmon—blue, with just a suspicion on the far edge of green. Leonard, if you believed in visions, and wished for the best possible, you could have nothing better than that before you. If your dreams were to get money and rubbish like that"—it will be remembered that I who enunciated this sentiment, and Celia who clapped her hands, and Leonard who nodded gravely, were all three very young—"such rubbish, it would lead you to disappointment, just as the golden water is turning black. But up above the colours are brighter; and they are lasting. They never fade."

"They are fading now, Laddy."

"Nonsense. Sunsets never fade. They are for ever moving westwards round the world. Don't you know that there is always sunset going on somewhere? Gold in evening clouds for some to see, and a golden sunrise for some others. So, Leonard, when your dreams of the future were finished you looked up, and you saw the sky brighter than the harbour. That means that the future will be brighter than anything you ever dreamed."

Leonard laughed. "You agree with Laddy, Cis? Of course you do. As if you two ever disagreed yet."

"I must go home, Leonard; it is nearly nine. And, oh, you are going away to-night, and when—when shall we see you again?"

"I am going away to-night, Cis. I have said good-bye to the Captain, God bless him, and I am going to London by the ten o'clock train to seek my fortune."

"But you will write to us, Leonard, won't you? You will tell us what you are doing, and where you are, and all about yourself?"

He shook his head.

"No, Cis, not even that. Listen. I have talked it all over with the Captain. I am going to make my fortune—somehow. I don't know how, nor does he, the dear old man. But I am going to try. Perhaps I shall fail, perhaps I shall succeed. I must succeed." His face grew stern and a little hard. "Because everything depends upon it, whether I shall be a gentleman, or what a gutter child ought to expect."

"Don't, Leonard."

"Forgive me, Laddy, but everybody knows that you are a gentleman by birth and descent, and very few know that I am too. Give me five years. In five years' time, if I live, and unless it is absolutely impossible for me to get home, I promise to meet you both again. It will be June the 21st in the year 1858. We will meet at this time—sunset—and on this same spot, by Celia's Arbour."

"In five years. It is half a lifetime. What will have happened to us all in five years? But not a single letter? Oh! Leonard, promise to write one letter, only one, during all the years, to say that you are well. Not leave us all the time without a single word."

He shook his head.

"Not one, Cis, my child. I am not going to write you a single letter. One thing only I have promised the Captain. If I am in danger, sickness, or any trouble, I am to write to him. But if you get no news of me set it down to good news."

"Then, if you will not write there is nothing to look forward to but the end of the five years. Laddy, don't you feel as if you were a convict beginning a five years' sentence? I do, and perhaps you will forget all about us, Leonard, when you are away over there, in the great world."

"Forget you, Cissy?" He took her hands, and drew the girl to himself. "Forget you? Why, there is nothing else in all the world for me to remember except you, and Laddy, and the Captain. If I could forget the seventeen years of my life, the town, and the port, the ships, and the sailors, the old walls, and the bastions—if I could rid my memory of all that is in it now, why—then, perhaps I could forget little Cissy. Other men belong to families. I have none. Other men have brothers and sisters. I have none. Laddy is my brother, and you are my sister. Never think, Cis, that I can forget you for one moment."

"No, Leonard. We will try to feel always that you are thinking about us. The Captain says nothing is better for people than always to remember what others would like them to say, and think, and do. Stay, Leonard." She had made a little bouquet of daisies, and the sweet wild convolvulus which spread itself over all the slopes of the walls. Out of this she picked two or three blossoms, tied them up with a tendril, and laid them in a paper. "That is my French exercise for to-morrow. Never mind. There, Leonard, carry that away with you, to remember me by."

"I will take it, Cis, but I want nothing to remember you by."

"And now, Leonard, make your promise over again. Say after me, 'In five years' time——'"

"In five years' time——"

"'In rags or in velvet'—be very particular about that, Leonard, you are neither to be too proud to come or too ashamed, in rags or in velvet."

"In rags or in velvet."

"'In poverty or in riches.'"

"In poverty or in riches."

"'In honour or——no, there can be no dishonour,—in honour or before the honour has been reached, I will return.'"

"I will return," echoed Leonard."

"And we will meet you here, Laddy and I."

He held her hands while she dictated the words of this solemn promise, looking up at him with earnest and pleading face.

Then the church clock struck nine, and from the Port Admiral's flagship boomed a solitary gun, which rolled in short, sharp echoes along the walls, and then slowly thundered up the shores of the harbour. Then there was a pause. And then the bells began their customary evening hymn. They struck the notes slowly, and as if with effort. But the hymn-tune was soft and sad, and a carillon is always sweet. That finished, there came the curfew bell, which has been rung every night in the old town since the time of the great Norman king. The day was quite done now, and the twilight of the summer night was upon us. Gleams of grey lay in the west reflected in the untroubled sheet of the harbour, the cloudless sky looked almost as blue as in the day, and the stars were faint and pale. Venus alone shone brightly; the trees, in the warm, calm night, looked as if they were sleeping, all but one—a great elm which stood at the end of the wall, where it joined the dockyard. It was shaped in the black profile of the evening something like the face of a man, so that it stood like a giant sentry looking every night across the harbour.

"I must go," said Celia. "Good-bye, Leonard. Good-bye, dear Leonard. Forgive me if I have teased you. We shall look forward—Oh! how eagerly we shall look forward to the end of the five years. Good-bye."

He took her in his arms, and kissed her again and again. She cried and sobbed. Then he let her go, and without a word she fled from us both, flying down the grassy slope across the green. In the twilight we could catch the glimmer of her white dress as she ran home, until she reached her father's garden gate, and was lost.

"Walk with me to the station, Laddy," said Leonard.

We walked away from the quiet walls where there was no one but ourselves, out from the shadow of the big elms, and the breath of dewy grass, and the peacefulness of the broad waters, down into the busy streets. Our way lay through the narrowest and the noisiest. Shops were open, especially places which sold things to eat and to drink. Hundreds of men—chiefly young men—were loafing about, pipes in their mouths, among the women, who were buying in a street market, consisting almost entirely of costers' carts and barrows, and where the principal articles exposed for sale appeared to be hot cooked things of pungent and appetising odour, served and dressed with fried onions. Every night, all the year round, that market went on; every night that incense of fried onions arose to the much-enduring skies, every night the crowd jostled, pushed, and enjoyed their jokes around these barrows, lit by candles stuck in bottles, protected by oiled paper.

"Look at them," said Leonard, indicating a little knot of young fellows laughing together at each other's gros mots. "Look at them. If it had not been for the Captain I might have been like them."

"So might I, for that matter."

"What a life! No ambition! No hope to get beyond the pipe and beer! If I fail it will be better than never to have tried. Laddy, I mean to make a spoon or spoil a horn, as the Scotch say."

"How, Leonard?"

"I do not know quite. Somehow, Laddy. Here we are at the station. You will be good to the old man, won't you? Of course you will, Laddy, a great deal better than I could ever be, because you are so much more considerate. Keep up his spirits, make him spin yarns. And you will look sharp after the little girl, Laddy. She is your great charge. I give her into your keeping. Why, when I come back she will be nineteen, and I shall be four-and-twenty. Think of that. Laddy, before I go I am going to tell you a great secret. Keep it entirely to yourself. Let no one know a word of it, not even the Captain."

"Not even Cis?"

"Why, that would spoil all. Listen. If I come back in five years' time, a gentleman, a real gentleman by position as I am by birth, I mean to—to ask little Celia to marry me."

I laughed.

"How do you know you will care for her then?"

"I know that very well," he replied. "I shall never care in the same way for any other girl. That is quite certain. But, oh! what a slender chance it is! I am to make myself a gentleman in five years. Celia has got to get through these five years without falling in love with anybody else. Of course all the fellows in the place will be after her. And I have got to please her when I do come back. Wish me luck, Laddy, and good-bye, and God bless you all three."

He squeezed my hand, and rushed into a carriage as the engine whistled, the bell rang, and the train moved away. Then I realised that Leonard was really gone, and that we should not see him again for five long years.

CHAPTER II.

THE CAPTAIN

I WALKED home sadly enough, thinking how dull life for the next five years was going to be. It was half-past ten when I arrived, but the Captain was sitting up beyond his usual hour, waiting to hear the last news of Leonard. He was at the open window overlooking his garden; before him stood his glass of grog, empty, and his evening pipe was finished.

"You saw him off, Laddy?" he asked with a little eagerness, as if Leonard might possibly be lurking in the hall. "You are quite sure he got safely into the train"—five-and-twenty years ago people were not so familiar with railway-trains, and they were generally regarded even by old sailors as things uncertain about going off, as well as untrustworthy when you were in them. "Poor lad! At Winchester by this time, very nearly. Thirty miles from salt water."

The Captain at this time was about sixty years of age. He was a man of short and sturdy build, with a broad and rosy face like an apple, and perfectly white hair. His whiskers, equally white, were cut to the old-fashioned regulation "mutton-chop," very much like what has now come into fashion again. They advanced into the middle of the cheek, and were then squared off in a line which met the large stiff collar below at an angle of forty-five. Round the collar, the Captain wore a white cravat, which put on many folds as the weather grew cold. He never appeared except in some sort of uniform, and paraded his profession habitually, as was the custom among sailors of his standing, by a blue frock with anchor buttons. In winter, he wore loose blue trousers, which, when the warmer days returned, he exchanged for white ducks. Upstairs he kept a uniform of surpassing splendour, with epaulettes, sword-belt, sword, gold lace, and an innumerable number of buttons. But this was reserved for ceremonies, as when a ship was launched, or when the Port Admiral invited the Captain to dinner, or when the Queen visited the Yard. On all other occasions, the blue frock with brass buttons formed the Captain's only wear.

He had great white beetling eyebrows which would have lent him a ferocious aspect but for the twinking blue eyes beneath them. There were crows'-feet lying thick about those eyes which gave them a curiously humorous look, not belied by the mobile lips below.

You might see, by the light of the single pair of candles, that it was a plainly furnished room, having in it little besides a small square table, a horsehair sofa, a wooden armchair, a bookshelf with a hundred volumes or so, most of them boys' school books, and a piano which was mine, given me by Mr. Tyrrell. The walls were decorated with pictures of naval engagements and ships, cut out of illustrated papers, or picked up at second-hand shops, mounted and framed by the Captain himself. Above the mantelshelf was a print of the Battle of Navarino, showing the Asia engaged with two Egyptian and Turkish men-of-war, one on each side of her, the rest of the action being invisible by reason of the smoke. The Captain would contemplate that picture with a satisfaction quite beyond the power of words.

"'Twas in '27," he would say; "I was Lieutenant then: Sir Edward Codrington was Admiral. We sailed into Navarino harbour at 2 P.M. after dinner. Gad! It was a warm afternoon we had, and lucky it was the lads dined before it. Something to remember afterwards. Don't tell me that Turks can't fight. A better fight was never made even by the French in the old days. But their ships, of course, were not handled like ours, and out of eighty odd craft, which made up their fleet, we didn't leave a dozen fit for sea again."

And on the mantelshelf was a model, made by the Captain, of the Asia herself.

The piano, I explained above, was my own. Everything else I had in the world came from the Captain; the clothes I wore were bought by him; it was he who brought me up, educated me, and lifted me out of the mire. I am bankrupt in gratitude to the Captain. I have no words to say what I owe to him. I can never repay by any words, acts, or prayers, the load of obligation under which I rejoice to be towards that good man.

It began, his incomparable benevolence to Leonard and to me, like a good many other important things, with a crime. Not a very great crime; nor was the criminal a very important person; but, as the Rev. Mr. Pontifex once said of it, it was emphatically a Wrong Thing, and like all Wrong Things ought to be remembered with Repentance. Mr. Pontifex, although he had never had the opportunity of reading a certain great Bishop's Treatise on the Sinfulness of Little Sins, was as uncompromising as that Prelate could wish, and I hope that Leonard, who was the criminal, has long since repented. Certainly, it was the infraction of a commandment. Now Mr. Pontifex has repeatedly asserted, and his wife approved, that he who breaks one commandment breaks all. This is what was done.

The Captain's house, one of a row, stood separated from the street by the respectability of three feet clear and an iron railing. It was close to St. Faith's Square, a fashionable and almost aristocratic quarter, inhabited by retired naval officers, a few men who had made fortunes in business, and a sprinkling of lawyers. It was a plain square red brick house, with nothing remarkable about it but the garden at the back. This was not a large garden, and, like others in the old town, was originally intended as a drying ground—all builders in those days were accustomed to consider a house as, in the first instance, a family laundry. The garden was planted with raspberry canes, gooseberry bushes, and currant-trees. Peaches and plums were trained along the walls. There were one or two small pear-trees, and there was a very fine mulberry. In the spaces the Captain cultivated onions, radishes, and lettuce with great success. But the garden was remarkable in having no back wall. It looked out upon the Mill-dam, an artificial lake designed, I believe, to flood the moats of the fortifications if necessary. Projecting iron spikes prevented the neighbours on either hand from invading our territory, and you could sit on the stone-work at the end of the wall with your feet dangling over the water. It was a broad sheet periodically lowered and raised by the tide, which rushed in and ran out by a passage under the roadway, close to which was the King's Mill, worked by the tide. Sitting in the garden you could hear the steady grinding noise of the mill-wheels. The Mill-dam was not without its charm. In the centre stood an island redoubt, set with trees like the walls, and connected with the road which crossed the water by a light iron bridge. There was a single storied house upon that island, and I remember thinking that it must be the grandest thing in the world to live upon it, all alone, or perhaps with Celia, to have a cask of provisions and absolute liberty to wander round and round the grassy fort, particularly if the iron bridge could be knocked away, and a boat substituted.

They have filled up the Mill-dam now; pulled down the King's Mill; destroyed the redoubt; and replaced the bright sparkling sheet of water with an open field, on which they have made a military hospital. The garden at the back of the house has got a wall too, now. But I wish they had let the old things remain as they were.

It was in this garden that the Captain was accustomed to sit after dinner, except when the weather was too cold. One day, nine or ten years before my story begins, he repaired thither on a certain sultry day in August at half-past two in the afternoon. He had with him a long pipe and a newspaper. He placed his arm-chair under the shade of the mulberry tree, then rich with ripe purple fruit, and sat down to read at ease. Whether it was the languor of the day, or the mild influence of the mill hard by, or the effects of the pipe, is not to be rashly decided, but the Captain presently exchanged the wooden chair for the grass under the mulberry tree, upon which, mindful of his white ducks and the fallen fruit, he spread a rug, and then leaning back against the trunk, which was sloped by Nature for this very purpose, he gazed for a few moments upon the dazzling surface of the Mill-dam, and then fell fast asleep.

Now at very low tides the water in the Mill-dam would run out so far as to leave a narrow belt of dry shingle under the stone wall, and that happened on this very afternoon. Presently there came creeping along this little beach, all alone, with curious and wondering eyes which found something to admire in every pebble, a little boy of eight. He was bare-footed, and bare-headed, a veritable little gutter-boy, clad almost in rags. It was a long way round the lake from the only place where he could have got down, a good quarter of a mile at least, and he stopped at the bottom of the Captain's garden for two excellent reasons, one that he felt tired and thirsty, and the other that the tide was racing in through the mill like the rapids at Niagara, that it already covered the beach in front and behind, and was advancing with mighty strides over the little strip on which he stood. And it occurred to that lonely little traveller that unless he could get out of the mess, something dreadful in the shape of wet feet and subsequent drowning would happen to him.

He was a little frightened at the prospect, and began to cry gently. But he was not a foolish child, and he reflected immediately that crying was no good. So he looked at the wall behind him. It was a sea wall with a little slope, only about five feet high, and built with rough stones irregularly dressed, so as to afford foot and hand hold for any boy who wished to climb up or down. In two minutes the young mountaineer had climbed the dizzy height and stood upon the stone coping, looking back to the place he had come from. Below him the water was flowing where he had stood just now; and turning round he found himself in a garden with some one, a gentleman in white trousers, white waistcoat, and white hair, with a blue coat, sitting in the shade. His jolly red face was lying sideways, lovingly against the tree, his cap on the grass beside him; his mouth was half open; his eyes were closed; while a soft melodious snore, like the contented hymn of some æsthetic pigling, proclaimed aloud to the young observer that the Captain was asleep.

The boy advanced towards the sleeping stranger in a manner common to one of tender age, that is, on all-fours, giving action to his hands and arms in imitation of an imaginary wild beast. He crept thus, first to the right side, then to the left, and then between the wide-spread legs of the Captain, peering into his unconscious face. Then he suddenly became conscious that he was under a mulberry tree, that the fruit was ripe, that a chair was standing convenient for one who might wish to help himself, and that one branch lower than the rest hung immediately over the chair, so that even a child might reach out his hand and gather the fruit.

This was the Wrong Thing lamented by the Rev. Mr. Pontifex. The unprincipled young robber, after quite realising the position of things—strange garden—gentleman of marine calling sound asleep—ripe fruit—present thirst—overwhelming curiosity to ascertain if this kind of fruit resembled apples—yielded without resistance to temptation, and mounted the chair.

Five minutes later, the Captain lazily opened his eyes.

Boom—boom—boom—the mill was going with redoubled vigour, for the tide had turned since he fell asleep, and was now rushing in through the dark subterranean avenues with a mighty roar. But except for the tide and the mill everything was very quiet. Accustomed noises do not keep people awake. Thus in the next garden but one two brothers were fighting, but as this happened every day, and all day, it did not disturb the Captain. One was worsted in the encounter. He ran away and got into some upper chamber, from the window of which he yelled in a hoarse stammer to his victorious brother, who was red-haired, "J—J—Jack—you're a c—c—c—carrotty thief." But invective of this kind, not addressed to himself, only gently tickled the Captain's tympanum; the sun was still very bright, the air was balmy, and I think he would have fallen asleep again but for one thing. A strange sound smote his ears. It was a sound like unto the smacking of tongues and the sucking of lips; or like the pleased champing of gratified teeth; a soft and gurgling sound; with, unless the Captain's ears greatly deceived him, a low breathing of great contentment. He listened lazily, wondering what this sound might mean. While he listened, a mulberry fell upon his nose and bounded off, making four distinct leaps from nose to shirt-front, from shirt-front to white waistcoat, from waistcoat to ducks, and from ducks to the rug. That was nothing remarkable. Mulberries will fall when over ripe, and the Captain had swept away a basket-full that day before dinner. So he did not move, but listened still. The noises were accompanied by a little frou-frou, which seemed to betoken something human. But the Captain was still far from being broad awake, and so he continued to wonder lazily. Then another mulberry fell; then half-a-dozen, full on his waistcoat, cannoning in all directions to the utter ruin of his white garments, and a low childish laugh burst forth close to him, and the Captain sprang to his feet.

To his amazement there stood on the chair before him a ragged little boy, barefoot and bare-headed, his face purple with mulberry juice, his mouth crammed with fruit, his fingers stained, his ragged clothes smirched; even his little feet, so dusty and dirty, standing in a pool of mulberry juice.

The Captain was a bachelor and a sailor, and on both grounds fond of children. Now the face of the child before him, so bonny, so saucy, so full of glee and confidence, went straight to his heart, and he laughed a welcome and patted the boy's cheek.

But the fact itself was remarkable. Where had the child come from?—Not through the front door, which was closed, nor over the wall, which was impossible.

"How the dickens——" the Captain began. "I beg your pardon, my lad, for swearing, which is a bad habit—but how did you get here?"

The boy pointed to the wall and the water.

"Oh!" said the Captain, doubtfully. "Swam, did you? Now that's odd. I've seen them half your size in the Pacific swim like fishes, but I never heard of an English boy doing it before. Where do you live, boy?"

The child looked interrogative.

"Where's daddy? Gone to sea, belike, as a good sailor should?"

But the boy shook his head.

"Daddy's dead, I suppose. Drowned, likely, as many a good sailor is. Where's your mammy?"

The boy looked a little frightened at these questions, to which he could evidently give no satisfactory reply.

"The line's pretty nigh paid out," said the Captain, "but we'll try once more.—Who takes care of you, boy, finds you in rations, and serves out the rope's end?"

This time the boy began to understand a little.

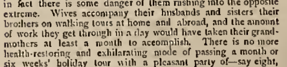
Then the Captain put on his hat and led him by the hand to the quartier where the sailors' wives did mostly congregate. In this he was guided by the fine instinct of experience, because he felt, in spite of the rags, that the boy had been dressed by a sailor's wife. None but such a woman could give a sea-going air to two garments so simple as those which kept the weather from the boy.

He led the child by the hand till presently the child led him, and piloted the Captain safely to a house where a woman—it was Mrs. Jemm—came running out, crying shrilly,

"Lenny! why, wherever have you bin and got to?"

There was another ragged little boy with a round back, five or six years old, sitting on the door-step. When the Captain had finished his talk with Mrs. Jeram he came out and noticed that other boy, and then he returned and had more talk.

(To be continued)



FASHIONS

ACCORDING to our annual custom we intend to devote the Fashion article for this month to the details of toilettes for country visiting, and travelling in general.

It is no longer the fashion for girls and women to be delicate, in fact there is some danger of them rushing into the opposite extreme. Wives accompany their husbands and sisters their brothers on walking tours at home and abroad, and the amount of work they get through in a day would have taken their grandmothers at least a month to accomplish. There is no more health-restoring and exhilarating mode of passing a month or six weeks' holiday tour with a pleasant party of—say eight, equally divided—each member of which is ready to laugh at any misadventure which may happen. We will take for example a tour of the English, Scottish, or Irish lakes, the Isle of Wight, the coast of Devon, or many other charming resorts. It is well before starting from home to despatch to the first proposed halting place two large trunks, the one containing linen and all other necessaries, the other dresses, bonnets, hats, and all finery for the feminine members of the party. Of the most important, namely, the linen trunk, we need only say that plenty of paper cuffs, collars, and fancy bibs will be found very useful. In the dress trunk should be a black silk costume for each voyageuse, with a good plain, long, train skirt, and two bodices, the one high to the throat, the other square or open in a point to the waist to be worn with a lace and tulle chemisette; bows and ruchings of colours according to the complexion of the wearer should be provided, as it is well to leave all valuable jewelry at home, with other responsibilities.—Four stylish hats or bonnets may be packed in one small square carton box, if the feathers or flowers be taken out, and arranged in a box to fit them. The art of packing well is acquired, as a rule, only by practice, although there are some personages born with a genius for it. As to the all-important question, what is to be worn by the pedestrians, the chief considerations are that the boots be strong and easy, the dress light, and either shower or waterproof, and that the hat does not press the forehead. There is nothing more serviceable and becoming for blonde or brunette than a navy blue or rifle green serge or thin cloth Princess dress, made to touch the ground, braided more or less handsomely with black or white braid, the skirt either looped up with two buttons, or, safer still, tied up with strings at the back and sides. A finely quilted alpaca petticoat, on either side of which is a deep, wide, flat pocket, which will contain a surprising quantity of things, a pair of extra stockings, and easy slippers, a small flannel dressing jacket, a brush and comb, a large Shetland shawl, which will be found very welcome when, at the end of a warm autumn day, the breezes spring up, and a work case containing everything that is needful for repairing unexpected fractures of the garments, together with sticking plaster and a small roll of lint in case of bodily injuries. The boots should be of porpoise hide, or some other strong leather, halfway up the legs, with square heels. The hat, of blue or green felt, to match the costume, should be trimmed only with a band and small wing, a long gauze veil may be twisted round the crown, and the end arranged so that it shall protect the face when needed, but we caution our inexperienced readers that at this season they may expect more rain than sunshine, and, after all, a gentle drizzle is more bearable than a scorching sun, and a stormy sunset is very beautiful to look upon. A deep mackintosh cape, together with a cover of the same for the hat, rolled up and fastened round the waist with a strap in readiness for the worst, will enable the pedestrian to defy the most stormy weather.

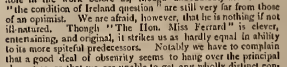
Bathing costumes are made more stylishly every season; pink, cream, and even pale blue flannel are used for this purpose, but these delicate colours speedily lose their freshness in sea water. The most durable and comfortable material for wear is bunting, the colour should be the darkest blue. Slender figures may wear loose full trowsers reaching to the ankle, and a short blouse fastened in at the waist. Those who are inclined to be stout will look better in long jackets. At Trouville and other fashionable French seaside places some of the bathing costumes are most artistic; for example, white fine serge, hand-embroidered in red wool, the design a coral pattern, turban hat and slippers to match, as is also the large mantle, which envelopes the bather when she leaves the water.

There is quite a rage for braiding and embroidery: not only the fronts of the bodices and skirts are richly braided or embroidered, but the backs are worked to match. Our contemporary, the Queen, recently gave a very elegant design for Breton embroidery, a jacket and a slipper; we advise our industrious readers to procure some black cashmere or thick silk and embroider for themselves costumes for the coming winter; this work is very quickly done, and is most effective. As yet there is no novel material for autumn wear, with the exception of cashmere merino. It is a very fine and soft fabric, made in every hue and shade imaginable. Black has lost none of its popularity, it is generally mixed with some bright contrasting colour, for example, poppy colour, cerulean blue, and ivory white. Dinner dresses of black velvet, satin, or poplin are made with long plain trains, the front trimmed en tablier with a delicate colour, the bodice cut square back and front, very low, but filled up with lace and tulle.

Bonnets and hats are most eccentric in shape, some exceedingly large, others equally diminutive; a charming little bonnet from Paris was composed of tiny beads of a blue-grey, known by the name of clair de lune; satin ribbon, black, white, and coloured, is much used for trimming bonnets and hats.

Much is expected in remote country towns and villages from the London visitors at the "great houses." Four costumes prepared for country visiting were: breakfast dress of white cambric, the front and side breadths were made with alternate strips of torchon lace insertion, and gathered cambric; petticoat of rose-pink cambric; fichu to match; a quaint little pink and white cambric hat, trimmed with convolvuli. Promenade dress of black faille richly embroidered on the front breadth and revers with blue steel beads, scarf mantelet to match, Brussels lace, Louis Quinze collar and ruffles, bonnet of beads, and a deep crimson rose with foliage. Dinner dress of three shades of green in silk, satin, and velvet, trimmed with Honiton lace. Evening toilette; black net elaborately trimmed with deep crimson, and pale pink satin, the effect of this novel combination was striking, but most elegant.

For dinner and evening dresses Indian muslin has again made its appearance. The only drawback to this material is that it gets so very quickly tumbled; it should always be worn over a white or coloured silk petticoat.



New Novels

"THE HON. MISS FERRARD," by the author of "Hogan, M.P.," &c. (3 vols.: Bentley).—As we have more than once commented on the extreme bitterness and cynicism which have marked this clever writer's sketches of the Irish life of our day, it is only just to say that these characteristics are much less noticeable in the work before us, though undoubtedly his views on "the condition of Ireland question" are still very far from those of an optimist. We are afraid, however, that he is nothing if not ill-natured. Though "The Hon. Miss Ferrard" is clever, entertaining, and original, it strikes us as hardly equal in ability to its more spiteful predecessors. Notably we have to complain that a good deal of obscurity seems to hang over the principal characters, so that we are unable to get any wholly distinct conception of them. The author is so much more successful in dealing with types than individuals, and shows so little real turn for construction, that we doubt whether the novel is his true field, and incline to think that his powers might show to greater effect in a series of sketches of Irish life, modelled, say, after Dickens' "Uncommercial Traveller." The Hon. Helena Ferrard is the daughter of Lord Darraghmore, an Irish nobleman utterly broken down in mind, body, and estate. She and her three brothers, Clanrickarde, Charles, and Isidor, are the children of a second marriage; there is another family, the issue of a first, but these play no part in the story. Lord Darraghmore's income has dwindled to 400*l.* a year paid quarterly, which to the Ferrards "just afforded a few weeks' riotous living, to be followed by a period of borrowing, account-running wherever they could get credit, and even actual want." Indeed the family larder is to a great extent dependent for supplies on the fish and game which the three lads, aided sometimes by the Hon. Miss Ferrard herself, legitimately or illegitimately succeed in capturing. In fact the heroine, when we first meet her at sixteen, is simply a young savage, who has grown up as she could, untrained, untaught, and uncared for, though possessed of some fine instincts, and singularly beautiful in her own way. And though her experiences, which it would take too much space to tell here, apparently do go some way towards taming and civilising her, we doubt if she is essentially different when we take leave of her, left utterly destitute by the death of her father, and on the point of starting for Canada with the young farmer to whom she has given her heart. But the truth is that, as we have already intimated, the author leaves us in much uncertainty as to Helena's real character, and we are puzzled to decide whether she is but the soulless being, the mere creature of impulse and affection, to whom handsome Jim Devereux will be all that a husband should be, or whether there is a deeper nature in her which may wake into life when it is too late, and force her to see that her husband, honest and good-hearted as he is, is but an uncultivated rustic. Indeed, we seem almost to have a hint given us just at the close of the story that the girl is beginning to be conscious that the refined and wealthy Englishman, Satterthwaite, whose love for her she has divined, is more to her than the man to whom her word is pledged. We do not think it was any part of the author's design that there should be so much mystery over all these matters, but it is a pity he did not bestow more pains in rendering them a little plainer. As to Satterthwaite, who may be taken as the hero of the piece, we should find it difficult to say whether the author meant us to regard his suppression of his love as folly or heroism. Of course there is abundance of talk in the book which gives the author an opportunity for airing the opinions as to Ireland that he has already expressed—the blunder of the Disestablishment Act, the rottenness of the system of national education, and the want in Ireland of "a national patriotic spirit," "a common-sense, solid love of progress." With all its shortcomings the novel is a book is of sufficient mark to well deserve to be read.

"Marjorie Bruce's Lovers," by Mary Patrick (2 vols.: Smith and Elder).—This is a rather pretty and clever tale, perhaps above the average as the mere love-story which is all it professes to be. Marjorie Bruce is a beautiful, high-spirited, and coquettish damsel, the daughter of a substantial Scotch farmer of very good descent, and her lovers are her old playmate, the young Earl of Castleton, Mr. Crawford, an exceedingly foolish and profligate laird of the neighbourhood—a personage by the way who might with advantage have been left out of the story, as he exercises no influence upon its course, and is not good to read about—and John Alton, a man in her own rank of life, of considerable culture, and a perfect pattern of moral excellence. The love-making with the handsome earl is for some time nothing but merry flirtation. It is known all over the country-side that he is engaged to his cousin, Miss Lisle, and he has no intention of being false to his word or the girl of taking advantage of his falsehood. But Marjorie's pretty face and witching ways lead him on, till the pair find that they are a great deal fonder of each other than they ever meant to be. In the end, however, the young lady wakes up from her dream of being one day a Countess—for this, as she honestly admits, has had not a little to do with her illusion and recognises John Alton's manifold perfections, refusing to be parted from him even when the coronet is laid at her feet—and everything ends satisfactorily for everybody. As might be anticipated, the girls, Marjorie herself, her friend Lady Dorothea, and Ernestine Lisle are very much the best drawn and most likeable among the characters, but the book, if but a trifle, has some good scenes in it, and may at least win popularity with young ladies.

"She Trod the Thorny Path," by Osborne Boyd (3 vols.: Tinsley).—Assuming that in this story we are supposed to be dealing chiefly with a set of lunatics who, of course, cannot be expected to behave like reasonable people, we may allow that it is put together with some ingenuity, though it is unnecessarily spun out. In the early part of it we have the heroine's father, who at first seems a decently affectionate parent enough, turning her out of doors for refusing to accept the husband he proposes. A little later, after she is married, she and her husband mistake and misjudge each other in a fashion that seems incredible in two persons living side by side, and possessed of the faculty of speech. He takes it into his head on very slight grounds that she is pining after an old lover, and, without saying a word, departs from his home, leaving a letter behind him so obscurely worded that the wife takes it to mean that he has gone because he is tired of her, instead of because he believes that she is tired of him. After this poor Gwen's path becomes in truth a thorny one, but we need not trace its farther course, and it will be enough to say that all complications are cleared up in the end. If the tale had been shorter, and somewhat less improbable, we might have felt more liking for it than we do.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

There is one thing wanting to make "Hebe, a Tale," by Mark H. G. Goldie (H. S. King), a poem—viz., that it should have been told by a poet. The author is, obviously, a man of devout mind, and a deep thinker on the most subtle of mysteries; he has also some technical skill. But his story shows an almost entire want of the imaginative faculty, he lacks the power of interesting a reader in the creatures of his fancy, and the tale—such as it is—is both wearisome and unskilful in construction. It seems to turn on the fickle loves of a speculative gentleman with the rather cacophonous patronymic of Conrad Hulshennie; what becomes of him and his Utopian schemes it is hard to say; his brother is killed in a coal mine, and, of his two lady-loves, Hebe—otherwise Miss Newton—seems inclined to follow her fugitive wooer, and Coralie appears to have become a Sister of Mercy. The long philosophical dissertations hinder one from a clear following of the narrative. Hebe soliloquises in 101 stanzas and a song. The work is probably that of a very young man, judging from the superabundance of simile, and the imperfect command of the ottava rima. Mr. Goldie, for choice, carries the sense on from the last line of a stanza to the opening one of that which follows it, preventing any idea of completeness or repose.

In "Songs of Sea and Land," by Frederick Enoch (A. H. Moxon), will be recognised a good many pieces popular in drawing-rooms, and at concerts; their calibre is about what might be expected in such performances. Perhaps, "The Knight and the Page" is somewhat above the usual level.—A volume of graceful, but slight, verse is "Poems," by Ernest Myers (Macmillan). Their musical nature may please some, and one or two are pretty and fanciful, such as "Sidney's Farewell," and "A Story from Ælian."—In "The Fall of Rora, and other Poems," by Aubrey De Vere (H. S. King), we have a new and revised edition of the author's more distinctively secular pieces, published before 1861. There is, as is well-known, always thought and lyrical facility in Mr. De Vere's verses, and many of these familiar pieces will be welcomed by their admirers; but personally we think the author is at his best only when dealing with religious or national topics.—"Chrysomela: a selection from the lyrical poems of Robert Herrick," arranged with notes by Francis Turner Palgrave (Macmillan), is, in spite of its rather affected title, a nice little anthology, containing the best pieces of one of England's sweetest lyrists. We think the editor rather over-estimates popular ignorance of Herrick, otherwise his introductory essay is well written; the glossarial notes might have been spared. One does not really need to be told by Mr. Palgrave that "Corinna's going a maying" is "faultless and sweet!" Nor are explanations wanted of such everyday words as "palms," "cruels," "paddocks," or "bents!" Why should the last-named be "sweet gale?" Has the editor never seen bunches of feathery grass employed in rural decoration?—The essentially artificial school to which belonged "Festus," a poem, by Philip James Baily (Longmans), has so completely passed away, that, notwithstanding the beauty of some of the incidental lyrics, it may be doubted whether the transcendental play will now find many readers. It is a pleasure to meet again with "The wee green neuk" and "Thus to a fair Venetian maid;" but otherwise the poem is undeniably heavy, although it has passages both powerful and of true poetic merit. It is almost impossible to avoid a mental comparison between works of this kind and Goethe's great original, and the imitations suffer in consequence.

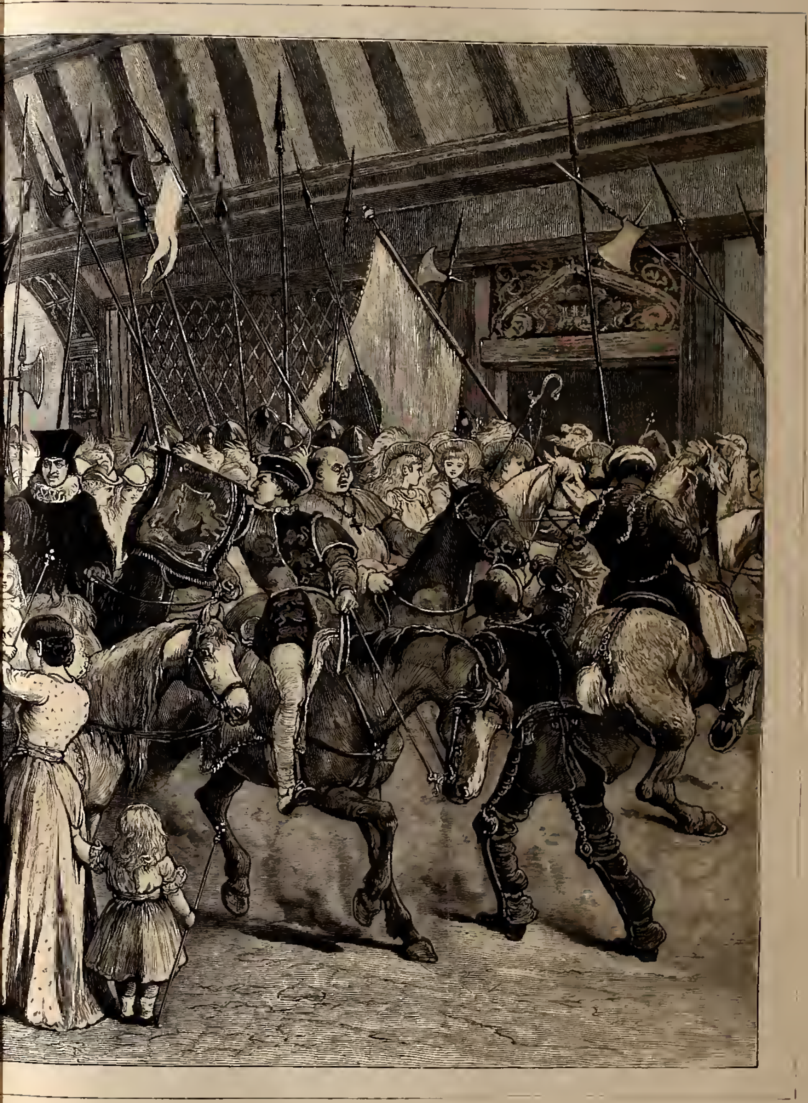
THE LADY GODIVA PRO



CESSION AT COVENTRY

THE READER

For all who care (and who in point of fact do not?) about the Greater Britain which is beyond the seas, there is always something worth reading in the yearly "Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute" (Vol. VIII., 1876-77: The Institute, 15, Strand). No doubt the discussions are at times decidedly of the speculative order—attempts of "the irresponsible amateur" to fill up à son gré that magnificent blank page, the political future of our Colonies according as they move towards closer union or complete separation from the old Home; though even such speculations have their use in preparing public opinion to consider questions which may easily at no very distant date become practical, and even pressing. But there is much besides that comes under discussion of immediate and everyday interest—statistics, as in the present volume, like those furnished by Mr. Symons of "the climates of the various British Colonies," comprehensive surveys like Mr. Lubbock's of "The Present Position of the West India Colonies"—Jamaica, we regret to find, by no means maintaining the start it took a few years ago—good descriptive accounts like Dr. Fraser's "Canada: as I remember it, and as it is," papers full of suggestiveness, like Mr. Plummer's on "The Colonies and the English Labouring Classes." In the discussion, by the way, of this last we were glad to note an occasional protest from "old colonists" against the hard and fast theory that in respect of emigration "no clerk or counter-skipper need apply." No class at home wants thinning more, and surely alleged lack of physique is not all decisive. The freeborn Yankee will never use his hands when it is possible to work by head, yet no man makes a better backwoods pioneer. We suspect it is not the absence of "the horny hand," but the want of will, and that reluctance to move out of old grooves which acts on many Englishmen as caste upon Hindoos, that accounts for the clerk's frequent failure as an emigrant. But the remedy is surely not to discourage him from emigrating, but to show him clearly in advance what is required to make emigration a success.

That vision of the political enthusiast, a Federation of Great Britain and her Colonies, is reduced with some success to a working scheme (on paper) in Mr. Bousfield's "The Government of the Empire" (E. Stanford)—a plan for the transformation of our Parliament into one more truly Imperial, of representatives (in two Houses as now) of the mother country and her dependencies, for all matters of foreign policy, natural defence, communications by land and sea, supreme courts of appeal, &c., with local Parliaments at home and abroad for the despatch of strictly local business. The little pamphlet is by no means without ability, and meritoriously free—unless its whole assumption must be so designated—from anything like crutches. Whether it will be possible ever thus to fight, as Goldwin Smith has said, "against geography and prevail;" whether, indeed, the lesser federations now in favour are not really steps away from, not towards, the all-embracing federation of which Mr. Bousfield speaks, are open questions at the least. It is curious to find the men who dream of a Greater Britain attacking Parliament as not imperial enough just when others, who would gladly see the present Britain less, complain of it as so intensely imperial that local interests get no attention.

A new, revised, and cheap edition of "Ocean to Ocean," by the Rev. G. M. Grant (S. Low and Co.), should put within every man's reach one of the best descriptions ever penned of the back lands of British North America, from the Great Lakes to the Pacific. Since the first publication its roseate visions have been slightly darkened. The survey of the Pacific Railway (expected four years ago to be half in working order by this) still halts amidst the difficulties of the Sea of Mountains. The grasshopper plague has scared away intending settlers from Manitoba. Worst of all, an Indian difficulty in British Columbia—the result, we fear, of neglecting the good old rule to make liberal treaties with the tribes, and keep them to the letter—has threatened British America, for the first time in its history, with mutterings of a native war. The story of these passing clouds—for passing clouds only we believe them to be—and the resumé of progress made after all, if more slowly than was hoped at first, make up in this new edition a very interesting appendix.

Part III. of Mr. B. Bucknall's excellent translation of the learned "Lectures on Architecture" of M. Viollet-le-Duc (S. Low and Co.) complete that portion of the work which treats of the principles of art and the development of architecture among the nations of antiquity and of the Middle Ages. It is once more, as in the latter days of Rome, a period of decline which the lecturer has in view—a decline, he holds, easily to be explained by the lifeless academic teaching which does not even take into consideration the adaptation of its work to the sentiment, the needs, the materials of the age, and proffers the same classically correct outline as equally applicable (after the necessary internal changes) for museum or hospital, for court of law or palatial dwelling-house. Not so the famous masters of mediæval France or of the Renaissance; and very eloquent are M. Viollet's lectures anent the great chateaux-builders of the sixteenth century, Philibert de l'Orme and his confrères, the exquisite sense of proportion traceable alike in old Greek temple and mediæval Gothic cathedral, or the just reasoning which, without any direct imitation, led to precisely the same results among the cornice-moulders of twelfth-century France and of the Greece of Pheidias. To substitute, in fact, for lifeless copyism a just subordination of rule to reason, and for neglect of "fitness" the true art which can ever adjust itself to new requirements, is the moral of M. Viollet's teachings—a moral, perhaps, not less worth enforcing in our country than in his own.

A second edition of a prettily got-up little volume, "Majolica and Fayence," by Arthur Beckwith (D. Appleton and Co., New York), will doubtless not be unappreciated by people in search of a brief yet comprehensive guide to the faience of Southern Europe and the East. Certainly, attempting too little is not among its faults. A descriptive account of faience old and new, of marks and mottoes and designs, plus a little of the history of the various towns and States, a little of the broad principles of Art, as applicable alike to poetry and porcelain, and laid down alike in Aristotle and Confucius, a little more about "painting on pottery" in particular, and yet a chapter of miscellaneous notes on symbols and emblems, prices of ware in the sixteenth century, designations of Italian pieces, and so forth, is almost in truth more than any human being could put together in 185 pages without an occasional rash statement or line that seems to need revision. Still it is by no means a bad little book, quite, in fact, a pocket encyclopædia in its way, with two good features we have yet to mention, an interesting list of the Keramic exhibits, more especially from Japan, in last year's "Centennial," and some pretty illustrations from the well-known collection of Signor Castellani.

To the ever pleasant literature of the angler Mr. J. J. Manley has added yet another pleasant and attractive volume in his "Notes on Fish and Fishing" (S. Low and Co.). A volume this for the Home Counties fisherman, not about unattainable salmon streams or tarns with wealth of trout and char, but about angling in Essex ponds, in quiet streams of Hants and Wilts, or on the broad expanse of Father Thames, for fish scarce five of which—the trout, the grayling, and the perch, with, let us add, the tiny gudgeon and the pike—repays the gourmand for his toil, but of which all are dear to honest anglers not only for the sport they give, but for the evening discussion, to which their capture inevitably gives birth, of how our ancestors could have lived and thrived when carp were dainties for an abbot's table and a Thames barbel a dinner for a King. A practical angler from school days upward, Mr. Manley is not, however, like most brethren of the craft content with notes upon the names and habits of his finny prey—he adds besides under the title of the "literature of fishing," a somewhat novel and highly interesting chapter on those who fished and wrote before him, from the fair authoress of the "Boke of St. Albans," the first of English writers on "Halieutics," to those great lights of contemporary fishers, Messrs. Cholmondely Pennell and Francis Francis. A book in fine in which we find no other fault than that Mr. Manley seems at times to take too literally old Gervase Markham's quaint remark that "the skilfull angler ought to be a generall scholler and seene in all the liberall sciences as a grammarian."

From "The Russo-Turkish War and its Issues as revealed in Scripture Prophecy" (W. P. Nimmo) readers who pin their faith to revelation as interpreted by the author of "The Coming Struggle" may learn that Russia beyond doubt will beat Turkey, overflow, and pass over," but that her career of conquest will then be stayed by "the merchants of Tarshish and the young lions thereof"—i.e., by Britain and her Indian Army, and above all by the planting, through British aid, of a colony of Jews in Palestine, the immediate prelude of the battle of Armageddon, and final doom of Russia and her host.—In "Seamen of the Royal Navy: Their Advantages and Disadvantages as viewed from the Lower Deck"—a pamphlet without author's name or publisher's—landsmen who may have thought the modern A.B. a happy man will find that—irrespective of such graver points as the disadvantages of his position (pension and all) after a term of years, compared, let us say, with a carpenter's on shore—a host of unpleasantnesses beset his steps from his first transfer from the pampered training-ship to the ship in commission—unpleasantnesses small perhaps in themselves and often due to an officer's endeavour to play the "tight hand," but quite enough in the aggregate to lead to much discontented comparison with his more genially treated fellow of the sister service. Altogether a grumbler's pamphlet, but with points in it quite worth taking note of.—Last, we must mention a new edition (W. Mitchell and Co.) of Major Lyon's useful "Militia Officer's Manual and Guide to Examinations," and "Proceedings of the Musical Association, Third Session, 1876-7" (Chappell and Co.), a number rich in valuable essays, though of an order which only skilled musicians as a rule will thoroughly appreciate.

The Midsummer volume of Good Things (Strahan) well fulfils the promise of its name. Here Dr. George Macdonald supplies the marvellous in the "The Princess and Curdie," a charming fanciful sequel to his "Princess and the Goblin;" Mr. D. Ker provides a stirring tale of the Danish Vikings, and the perils of travel are described by "An Old Rugby Boy," while numerous short stories and sketches of a more substantial nature combine to form a capital book for girls and boys to enjoy during their seaside holidays. The July and August numbers of Good Things furnish the first instalment of M. Jules Verne's new tale, "Hector Servadac." This story has just been brought out in Paris, and promises to be as full of mysteries and eccentric adventures as its predecessors.—For Sunday reading comes the half-yearly volume of The Day of Rest (Strahan), which amongst its most interesting matter includes a good series of "Old Testament Portraits," and some clever articles by Mr. R. Proctor, in addition to excellent miscellaneous papers and stories.—Some well-compiled meditations and hymns on Scripture texts are contained in "The Morning, Noonday, and Eventide of Life," by R. C. Gildea (Charing Cross Publishing Co.).

A number of handbooks on varied subjects come to us from the Bazaar Office. People with a little spare cash to place out will do well to study "Stock and Share Investments," by A. Sharwood, which may be commended for its practical advice and clear description of the nature and quality of securities and the operations of the Stock Exchange.—Those who have not yet decided where to go this autumn may be helped to a choice by "Seaside Watering Places," wherein are equally detailed our best and least known holiday resorts. It would have been better, however, to place these descriptions either alphabetically or in their order along the coast, as at present the sketches fly from Cornwall to Yorkshire, from Suffolk to the Isle of Wight, in the most confusing manner.—"Practical Dairy Farming," by G. S. Wilcombe, is an excellent straightforward treatise on the management of a farm, its stock, cheese manufacture, buildings, and lands; in "Fancy Mice," by an Old Fancier, we have simple directions for the proper care and breeding of those tiny pets, dear to most boys; and "Popular British Fungi," by J. Britten, gives an agreeable account of the principal edible and poisonous varieties. Mr. Britten's work is nicely illustrated, and supplies very interesting particulars as to the curious growth of fungi.—"The Apple," by D. T. Fish (The Country Office), would be specially useful to amateur growers, as it indicates the plainest methods of culture, and specifies the best varieties to plant for cooking or for the table.

A capital little biography of Peter Paul Rubens has been published at Antwerp by J. B. Van Mol (29, Marché aux Souliers) àpropos of the recent tercentenary fêtes of the great painter's birth. Written in a bright lively style, and illustrated by numerous portraits of Rubens, his two wives, and many of his best-known contemporaries, this work, which is sold for two francs, forms a concise and yet comprehensive memoir of the old Flemish master.

THE PRIVATE SOLDIER

III.

A SKILFUL mechanic, in the receipt of high wages, and steady in his habits, might reasonably argue that he could not better his condition by entering the army. The artisan who earns from thirty to thirty-five shillings a week can not only live comfortably, but can also, with ordinary care, put by something for a rainy day, and it is more than likely that a course of thrift, persisted in for some years, will raise him to a higher position, and enable him in his turn to become an employer of labour.

But it is not every man who can earn pay at so high a rate, and there are fewer still who can depend upon it in times of prosperity and depression of trade alike. Again, upon considering the average wages of the working classes, at the average age at which recruits from them enter the army, we find that the above maximum of earnings is still further reduced, and that it is more or less precarious, and dependent upon the fluctuation of trade and other causes beyond control. It is, nevertheless, very hard to persuade men who have once experienced a sudden rise in wages that it will not continue, or that if the price of labour falls it may be a long while before it recommences to advance, and they are content to wait for improved times. In the case of a prudent man who has saved money this may be possible, without exposing himself to any great inconvenience. The majority of the working-classes, however, can scarcely be called prudent in any strict sense of the term, and these must suffer many hardships when work is slack. There is also a large class of young men who earn comparatively small wages, and have little to induce them to remain in their present condition. It is reasonable to suppose that they have a desire to see more of the world, and fair to believe that many of them have some ambition to raise themselves in it. They are not confined to any one section of society, but may be found in every grade, from the highest to the lowest. And we believe that service in the Army will be found upon trial to offer at least as fair a chance of advancement as any other profession to those who use their opportunities aright. Recruits of good social position and education can and do look forward to commissions; those of an inferior rank of life to suitable employment at good wages when their term of service has expired. Everywhere we hear complaints of the labour market being overstocked, and we see thousands of youths and men either without occupation or dragging on a hand-to-mouth sort of existence, without any settled plan or prospects for the future. Although the art of war affords scope for the exercise of the noblest gifts of genius, there are many subordinate positions in the Army that can be filled with honour and profit to themselves, and to the good of the State, by men who are of very moderate ability. There are also some moral as well as physical qualities which can be turned to very much better account in the Army than elsewhere, and it is far more easy to obtain a ready recognition of these in the ranks than at the workman's bench, in the shop, or the counting-house. Steadiness is of course of the first importance; and it may be said, if this is given, the chances of promotion in any walk of life would be increased. This of course is so; but, from our own experience, we believe that habits of steadiness and self-denying discipline have been acquired in the Army when all other experience has failed to teach them. We refer only to men naturally well inclined, but who, through temptation, or extreme weakness of character, or perhaps from having no sense of responsibility, have not hitherto been quite all that could be wished. For the confirmed drunkard or the absolutely vicious the Army is scarcely a fitting school, and will soon cease to be even temporarily their home. But for men whose faults have been venial, or whose chief failing has been want of application or stability of character, service in the Army may be expected to do much. In the first place, it is no longer optional to conform to rules and regulations. The work is light, but it has to be done; the rules are not severe, but they must be obeyed. A most wholesome check is thus placed upon recklessness, or that light-heartedness which takes undue liberties, in the belief that they will be condoned once more for the last time, or that, Micawber-like, buoys itself up with the hope that, if the worst come to the worst, something else will "turn up." In fact, it may fairly be said that the discipline of our Army, as a whole, is light to good men, sufficient, like the string of a kite, to restrain and yet support men of good disposition, and that it only bears heavily upon the evilly disposed. But it cannot easily be shirked, and it cannot be thrown off in a momentary fit of disgust, unless by the commission of a crime. And in these very particulars, which may not be looked upon as unmixed benefits by those for whom we do not write—namely, those who are known as Q.H.B.'s., or Queen's Hard Bargains—one of the great advantages of the Army as a career may be found. The employment offered is permanent during the period for which they engage, and the advantages offered to well-behaved men are invariable, except where by good conduct they earn the right to greater ones. There are no fluctuations of the labour market which can affect them, unless it be in the way of raising their value, and therefore their pay. In time of war, it is true, they have to suffer more or less hardship, and to incur more or less risk; but fighting is not the normal condition of an army, though a state of readiness for it ought to be. Besides, when encountering these occasional privations, the soldier has the consolation of knowing that he is serving his country, and that his sufferings are not endured in vain. As a soldier he is an active participator in the success of the nation, as a civilian he may be a passive sharer in her reverses. But we do not think that any Englishman would weigh too carefully the chances of his ever being called upon to serve in the field, or reckon them as a drawback to embracing the career of a soldier.

Next to the permanency of employment, we may consider the work itself, and this cannot be considered heavy. In the infantry it is lightest of all, as the cavalry have their horses to care for, and the artillery both horses and guns. A recruit, too, until he has passed his drill and musketry course, has more to do. He has also to attend school and gymnasium. When once he is dismissed he has, of course, to take his turn with other soldiers in guard, escort, and fatigue duties, but these are not heavy, and in the infantry, at any rate, he has as much spare time on his hands as is likely to be good for him. The gunners and drivers of the Royal Artillery have considerably heavier duties, the former are employed in the usual duties mentioned above, and in the care of the guns and stores, or, if not so employed, to assist the drivers in the stables, in the care of horses and harness, and furnishing stable guards. These duties, of course, leave them less spare time. Still many men prefer working with horses, even with the increased labour, and the appearance of the gallant gunners certainly does not betoken that they are overworked. Cricket is not a game to which men who are physically exhausted betake themselves as a relaxation, and both this and football are favourite pastimes with all branches of the service. Nor has the well-conducted soldier any difficulty in obtaining a pass, by which he may obtain more time to himself out of barracks.

The periods of service or duration of the employment may next be considered, and they may be divided for present purposes into short and long service. There are modifications which we shall notice when we come to the consideration of the system of Deferred Pay. A man who engages for short service has to serve six years with the colours, and six years in the Army Reserve. For long service he engages for twelve years with the colours, with the option of re-engaging for nine more, that is to say, twenty-one in all, and the prospect of a pension. This principle is maintained, through the periods may vary in length. In the artillery, for instance, men are enlisted for the following periods. The first period of twelve years, or at option, eight years with their batteries and four years with the Army Reserve: the second period, nine years in addition to the above, the whole of this last term to be passed with their batteries; and so on. We hope to conclude this subject in our next article, with some remarks upon pay, pensions, and the general advantages held out to recruits, as well as the condition of the soldier.

GOING OUT OF TOWN

Amongst all the social institutions which have arisen into prominence during the last twenty-five years or so, it would be difficult to find one more essentially characteristic of modern phases of civilisation than the periodical exodus which empties London, about the time when the evenings begin to grow perceptibly shorter, and the afternoons more insufferably hot. The only parallel flitting which can be suggested is that which, earlier in the year, impels people in the country to turn their backs on their roses, new mown hay, and strawberries, and to do penance in stuffy lodgings off Piccadilly or the Strand. Both may be symptoms of the restlessness and love of change which are such oppressively distinctive signs of the feverish age in which we live; when people who do not place their summum bonum in outstripping, or outshining, their neighbours are treated by the world in general, if not with reprobation, yet with compassionate pity very near akin to contempt. But the difference between the two forms of restlessness consists in the fact that, whereas the former, whether dictated by necessity or by caprice, has some raison d'être, it is, in the generality of cases, next to impossible to find a tangible excuse for the latter. What earthly benefit, temporal or spiritual, can nine-tenths of the country cousins derive from their purgatorial sojourn in town during a London midsummer? Will anybody pretend that their minds are enlarged, their intellects cultivated, or their views rendered less narrow, by a contemplation of the equipages in Hyde Park, the dresses as seen from an amphitheatre stall at the opera, or the round of more or less edifying explorations of churches? How much happier they would be at home!

O fortunati nimium sua si bona norint

The only evident result of such gadding is that, for the next few months, the brambles make acquaintance with fragments of feminine garments apparently modelled after the windsail of a yacht, and that Mrs. and the Misses Primrose electrify the Sunday School children by awful coiffures, which suit their good, innocent features much as the perwig of Queen Elizabeth might have done the head of Lady Jane Grey. True, they have picked up enough fashionable and artistic cant to make their chat a weariness to the soul of the unhappy man, sick of town, who has fled to the country, and is fated to take one of them in to dinner; but such a gain, though doubtless great, can hardly be said to counterbalance the risk of fever, waste of time and money, and worst of all, the loss of natural simplicity of heart and mind, which are the main results of their insensate junketings! Apart from the folly of their blind worshipping of that Moloch and Ashtaroth combined, "Fashion," they are perhaps more to be pitied than blamed for their choice of the actual time when they elect to visit the metropolis, because they really go to see and be seen, and Society has decided, that only during that season of the year when Nature shows herself at her best, shall it be lawful for Art to assert its rivalry in full force—probably for fear that if people once found out how sweet and fair are real flowers in June, they would be tempted in future to forsake for them the artificial blooms of Bond Street! But this excuse brings one to the real gravamen as touching the system of "going out of town"—why should folk go when they do, why should some of them go at all, and, granted the necessity, why should they pitch on such places as they do to go to?

Perhaps it would be useless to suggest, that there is no primâ facie evidence that the national affairs would be worse transacted were Parliament to sit in the cooler months of the year, instead of its members being doomed to swelter through night after night of such weather as we had in June last. Yet the Session of the Houses is one great reason why many must be in town during the summer months. And, of course, an indignant chorus would announce that there is no shooting or hunting during that period of the year; it being postulated that the country would be unbearable without something to kill or frighten! Which speaks volumes for the real amount of appreciation of Nature existing in the average British breast, however much people may twaddle over Academy landscapes, or the Poet Laureate's latest word-picture. As a proof of this, we know of one of the most beautiful and stately old moated granges in Suffolk which, as a matter of fact, cannot find a tenant, because, forsooth, "there is no shooting!" There are only perfect grounds, and a noble house. But even supposing such reasons be accepted as valid in the case of the higher classes, why should clerks in offices, comfortable tradesfolk, and the like, think it incumbent upon them to put off their holiday till the sun has robbed the summer of its first freshness? They have not got to attend debates, and most of them could not hit a haystack, if they had the chance; why not enjoy the woods and meadows, or the sea-shore, when all are at their best? Can this be another little symptom of that aping of their superiors, which is the great curse of modern middle-class existence?

As to why it should be needful for people to go out of town at all, the answer is obvious. Thanks to centralisation, and a few other modern blessings, it is only by a timely flight from their temporary homes that Londoners save themselves from their permanent resting place! It is too late to object now; only if we had found out some time ago that the metropolis was not the necessary centre of life, some of its natural inhabitants might have been able to enjoy life in it, as much as others in their respective country towns; and London life need not have been, as it is, a synonymous expression for death by exhaustion of the vital forces!

So, since it is allowed that people must, and, indeed, ought to go out of town, it only remains to inquire on what principle they select their country resorts. Certainly not, as might be expected, for the sake of retirement, rest, or mental refreshing; else why are all the so-called "watering-places" crammed every year, regardless of their natural attractions, whilst, in spots which beat them hollow for beauty, lodgings may be had for an old song. It is doubtless true that Margate air is bracing, and that Brighton Downs are admirable for expanding the lungs; only we notice, that the inducements publicly held out to visitors by the caterers for those two resorts are the Hall by the Sea and the Aquarium—especially at night. And as such astute persons may be presumed to have gauged the public taste, it would seem that change of amusements is the great object of those who go there, and not the communing with Nature. In which case they had really better stop at home, and go to bed early! No, if people have a sincere desire for Nature, let them have it, and the more the better; only let us be honest, and not give false reasons for what is nothing in the world but an impatience of stopping in our proper places.

There was a time when father and son were content to live and die in the same old home, loved and respected by their neighbours, and careless of what the outside world might think. Then it was no shame to the merchant, or the tradesman, to live over his shop; and the weekly visit to the market town was sufficient excitement for the country wife. But we have changed all that; the world, and the world's opinion, have come to be our standard of worth. We are a great deal wiser than our grandmothers; but looking at our hollow egg-shells we may doubt, in lucid intervals, whether our wisdom has not been bought almost as dearly as Mother Eve's. B. M. ARCHERY MEETINGS

Few amusements are so wearisome as Archery to the looker-on who is not an archer. The thud of the arrows entering the target soon becomes even more monotonous than the misses. The "dull mechanic pacing to and fro" (miscalled "ends," as they seem endless), grows tiresome enough in half an hour. But at most meetings there are compensations in the shape of greeting friends, and luncheon, while laughter and merriment proceeding from both archers and visitors show that archery, like croquet, has its secondary uses in bringing together pleasant people and keeping them amused. If making "golds," however, and seeing his neighbours is all that that the ordinary archer has in view, the elevation of archery itself into the list of the exact sciences is the aim of the Grand National Archery Meeting. Bunglers and novices soon find that the meeting is no place for them. Its object is distinctly business rather than pleasure. As Sarah Battle upheld "the rigour of the game" in whist, all desultory talk and flighty shooting is hateful to Grand National Archers. We are not positively certain that their code forbids engaged and engaging young men or newly betrothed couples to enter the lists, but it would assuredly look down upon philandering and flirting. Such light amusements may well become a village-green meeting, or even a provincial gathering of archers, but the dignity of the Grand National would be compromised did wreathed smiles, soft eyes, and lovers' badinage interfere with the York Round or the champion score. It is even rumoured that lobsters are ostracised from its luncheons because of the proverbial ladies in their heads, and that exception has been lately taken by the more straight-laced members of the Committee to the admission of woodmen of Arden Archers, lest a distraught pair of lovers like Orlando and Rosalind, who erstwhile talked soft nothings in a forest of similar name, should appear before the Grand National targets. Consequently Cupid lays aside his bow in disgust at its meetings. Though the decent Graces and Nymphs remain, their Queen turns her purple swans to Paphos, or at all events to some more genial meeting in the Shires, quo blandæ juvenum revocant preces. No frivolous young men are to be seen, veteran shots contend for victory, with unflinching endurance of all the vagaries of our climate, upheld by a heroic determination to do their duty to archery. It may be that their example will win a careless public once more to apply itself in serious earnest to bow and arrows, and reap glories akin to those gained by its ancestors at Cressy. At all events, these votaries of archery challenge approval, just as we wish well to the Welsh patriots in their attempts to rehabilitate a moribund language by means of prize poems and Eisteddfodds, or the good people who would close every ale-house on Sunday, and entirely forbid vivisection. A forlorn hope can stir the languid pulse of the present generation as well as does a star shower or a two-headed calf.

The Great Western Archers have recently been holding their meeting at Teignmouth, and few places in Devonshire boast a more varied neighbourhood. On the highway to Cornwall, with Exeter and Torquay on either hand, and the Dartmoor Tors filling in the background, to say nothing of the attractions of the blue summer sea in front,—he is a lucky archer who could there take the first part of his holiday. In strong contrast to the austerity of the Grand National meeting, Teignbridge with its popular ladies' meetings lies at a short distance from Teignmouth, like a Devonshire Capua. There archery and cricket allure gay youth throughout the season, while matches of another kind are not uncommonly made up in its cool shades and festive bowers, where never finding themselves unequal to the waltzes with which the merry meeting crowns the evening. Derogatory as it is to make the confession in the presence of the Grand National and Great Western meetings with their lofty aims, perhaps some people entertain more cherished memories of an afternoon's enjoyment at Teignbridge. But Teignbridge with its red cliffs, stained as the legend says with the blood shed by the Danes, the Esplanade (or Den) which according to one etymology yet bears that people's name, the wooded environs of the little town and the proverbial hospitality of the West might well induce either shooter or non-shooter to stay there during the three days of the festival. An archery meeting is also a pretty sight. The smooth sward dotted with opposite rows of targets, the flutter of dresses and ribbons around them, the strains of the band, the gay streamers, the sudden closing of parasols as the ladies prepare to shoot, the targets themselves, one moment brilliant with red and gold rings, and next moment converted into large slices of tipsy-cake, as it were, from the arrows flying into them, all this forms a fair picture set in an umbrageous background. Then the walk over with its pleasant greetings between friends and foes, the whispered gossip among the ladies as each amateur Robin Hood draws his bow to the utmost, the excitement and half-suppressed rivalry,—this adds to the bewildered amazement with which the distinguished foreigner surveys this survival of the Middle Ages. Beyond the combatants is a waving fringe of spectators, and beyond them again flags and tents and carriages and the whole country side en fête. The markers and officials move about meanwhile with a ripple of laughter and fun following their footsteps, for they are generally the most genial members of the gathering, very unlike the stern unbending magnates of the Grand National. Those are too much oppressed by their duties to joke, and are thus widely removed from the portly rectors and jolly retired admirals of smaller meetings. The ball which usually follows these pleasant provincial gatherings makes no demands upon the most delicate archer's strength. Only a stout arm and iron constitution can venture on the competition of the Grand National. The whole affair is much too serious a matter to include dancing until the three days' strain is over.

> The feet of Joy
> Might wander all day long and never tire,

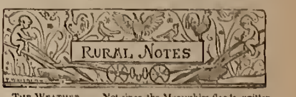
But what a buzz of excitement! The champion archer of the meeting advances. Calm and self-possessed Sagittarius takes up his position like Apollo, nunquam humeris positurus arcum. The whole assemblage hangs on his exploits. He lays his hat on the ground, and coolly drives one arrow into the red, the next into the gold, and fairly misses with the third. Compare his prowess with the still greater self-possession of Virgo, the lady paramount. Whiz! without an apparent effort arrow after arrow as a matter of course rush into the target. She makes at least one gold at each end. Her less successful sisters smother their envy. But when ladies are concerned, unlike her arrows the shafts of criticism must fall short. And now the rank and file begin to shoot. Here it is that archery is apt to pall on the spectator. The heat too is becoming insufferable. It is time to seek the luncheon tent. M. G. Watkins



The Weather.——Not since the Morayshire floods, written about so graphically by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder in 1829, have there been such devastating "spates" in the north of Scotland; and the area of the volume of water has not been confined to the north side of the Spey or the Tweed. It has fallen in the Midland and Western counties of England, to the detriment of all who grow agricultural produce and who keep stock. The harvest has been late; much grain that was cut before the rainfall was lying out in the fields, and that not cut has been prostrated beyond the aid of reaping machines in the late localities. A fortnight ago the notion was that we should have on the whole a pretty prosperous harvest if fine weather came; but "the best-laid schemes of mice and men gang aft agley," and they have certainly done so. The Colorado beetle may be left out of the question. The "blight," that mysterious malady, has been present in our fields for a third of a century, and the rain that has come down in sheets latterly has done much to increase its malignant influence. Late potatoes will not be good this year. Hay in some parts of Ireland is still unlifted, and St. Swithin seems to have grown worse tempered on account of the eclipse of the moon. The harvest home is now a matter that above all things engages the attention of agriculturists. The "knee-gartered man," as he has been called, has quite settled in his mind that there will be no necessity this year to pull down his barns and build greater; the doubt is whether the corn will come out in good colour.

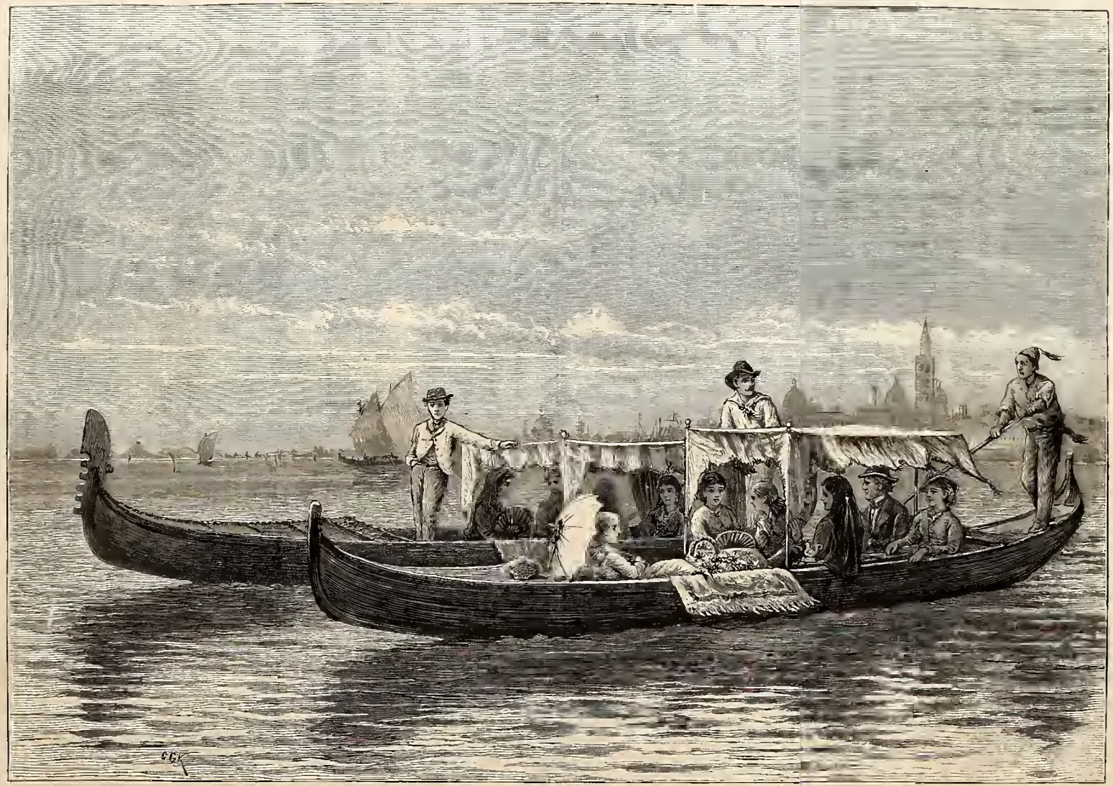
Corn Prices.——There is this, however, in favour of the farmer, that prices this year for the week ending Aug. 25 were decidedly better than they were in the corresponding week of 1876. The sales at the various markets as returned to the Controller were, of wheat, 19,183 qrs., of barley, 294, and of oats, 1,512. This does not seem an extravagant lot to buy, but perhaps millers had a lot on hand, and farmers were hanging back for higher prices, seeing that Russia cannot have much to dispose of at present. In wheat last week there is a wonderful difference from the corresponding period of last year—63*s.* 10*d.*, against 46*s.* 4*d.*, which means 17*s.* 6*d.* in the British farmer's pocket. Barley sales were so paltry in amount that they are not worth quotation, and the value per quarter beyond that received in the second week of August last year was 1*s.* 2*d.* per qr. The average price was 33*s.* 9*d.*, which on 294 qrs. cannot rule prices. Oats—the food of horses in England, and of men in Scotland, according to the great lexicographer—sold to the extent of 1,512 qrs., and at the price of 28*s.* 4*d.* for eight bushels, 3*d.* more than in the corresponding week of 1876. This may be said in defence of oats and oatmeal, that no work-horses in England have brought such high prices as those reared in the Vale of the Clyde, fed or trained, which is perhaps a better expression, by those fed on oatmeal. 1,500*l.* is not a common price for a work-stallion, but this was given for the "Prince of Wales" belonging to Mr. Fleming some years ago, and within the last week or two a cool thousand was given for a mare and filly foal.

Russian Cattle.——These are commodities which, properly enough, do not figure in the Board of Trade returns. It seems to be conclusively proved that the Russian steppes are the originators of that disease which makes so irritant the stomachs, and consequently the mouths, of dairy and feeding stock, and shortly cuts off life altogether; therefore we get no cattle from Russia. But Russia has a lot of cattle, according to the last returns 28,600,000, in all a number meaning thirty-five head to every man, woman, and child of the vast empire. The Cossack territory is not thickly populated with human beings, thank goodness, if all the accounts we have heard of them be true, and there we have 111·8 beasts to 100 of the people. Opposite the General Post Office there is an hotel, over the front of which there are these lines—

> Milo the Crotonian an ox slew with his fist,
> And ate it up at one meal. Ye gods, what a glorious twist!

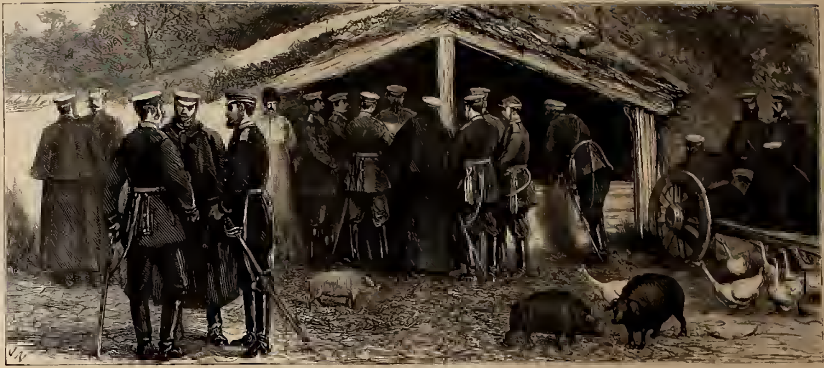
If each living Cossack, young or old, ate a bullock in a year, there would be still enough and to spare.

Miscellaneous.——Mr. John Thornton has some grand shorthorn sales on in the first week of September. Some Grand Duchesses have been sent across from America by Mr. Cochrane to the pleasant Windermere district, and a large portion of his herd of Booth's blood. Mr. Cochrane spared no expense to get his herd up to perfection. The sale of the imported animals takes place on Sept. 4; next day comes the Rev. T. Stainforth's, and following Mr. Ashburner's. It is quite expected that the "four figures" will be realised. Sir William Sterling Maxwell, of Keir, is to hold his annual sale of Clydesdales in October. It will be remembered that Sir William was very successful with his shorthorn bull Forth, and that his Clydesdales have ever been in the van of the best bred of work-horses in the world.—Greatly to the regret of all interested in the Shropshire sheep, it is announced that Mrs. Beach, of the Hattons, we need scarcely say Staffordshire, as everybody who attends shows knows her stock, has resolved to sell off. At all exhibitions her stock has taken a premier place, and there is little doubt that they will on the 10th September.—A statistical account of the stock in Denmark shows that 31 per cent. belongs to farmers holding from 15 to 29 head, 5 per cent. to those holding from 100 to 199 per head, and only 1·4 per cent. to occupants of farms keeping 200 and upwards. Last year Denmark exported 107,977 oxen, &c., and 6,938 calves; 62,373 of the former and 1,313 of the latter came to Great Britain—more than half of the cattle and a fifth of the calves.—The Agricultural Gazette of last Monday says, what every intelligent agriculturist in the kingdom must endorse, that Mr. J. J. Mechi has been the most successful agriculturist in certain branches of farming in the British Isles. "Only a very bold man could for a moment undertake to found another Tiptree." The occasion for this special remark is the presentation by Mr. Mechi of two volumes to the British Museum which have been completed and compiled by thousands of contributors.



"PICNIC PARTY ON THE LAGOON"

FROM THE PICTURE BY G. G. KILBURNE IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY



RUSSIAN COUNCIL OF WAR DEBATING THE ADVISABILITY OF A RE-ATTACK ON PLEVNA

SWIMMING THE CHANNEL

PROFESSOR CAVILL, who last year failed in his endeavour to perform the feat achieved by Captain Webb, has now tried again and succeeded. Starting late in the afternoon of the 20th ult., from the French coast, at Cape Gris Nez, he swam all night accompanied by an attendant lugger, and a row-boat to show him the course, and about twelve hours afterwards arrived within fifty yards of the English shore, about a mile to the eastward of South Foreland lighthouse. Here he was taken on board the lugger, not because of any doubt as to his ability to accomplish the remaining short distance, but on account of the dangerous rocks which line the coast at that point. Before starting Mr. Cavill was well rubbed with porpoise-oil, and the voyage, or "swim," was accomplished almost without incident, if we except the "frequent administration of refreshment." He swam at a good pace, with a steady side stroke, and when the task was over he did not appear nearly so much fatigued as after his unsuccessful attempt of last year. It may seem ungracious to speak coolly of an exploit which requires so much patience, courage, and determination, but it is difficult to say that any good purpose can possibly be served by such extraordinary feats of endurance as have become fashionable of late, especially when we reflect that they are undertaken under such artificial conditions as render them practically valueless even as tests of individual strength. The amazing distances walked by Weston and O'Leary in covered halls, with carefully laid tracks, and with all kinds of physical aids and adventitious excitements, can be no fair criterion of what those celebrated "walkists" would be able to accomplish upon an open country road, depending entirely upon their own resources. So likewise of Captain Webb and Professor Cavill. Both have ploughed through the water between France and England, it is true, but could either of them swim half the distance if wrecked or cast overboard sans porpoise oil to keep out the cold, and with no chance of "frequent refreshment" on the way?—Our engraving is from a sketch taken by Mr. V. J. Vadlant, of Boulogne, a few minutes after the start. Cavill is seen following the pilot rowing-boat. The two-masted vessel is the French lugger, which escorted him on the journey, and the large rowing boat, manned by the lighthouse keeper, carried M. Hamcrel, the Maire of the Commune to which Gris Nez belongs, and some other gentlemen, who accompanied the swimmer for some distance. The lighthouse upon the headland is 192 feet above the level of the sea, and was the first beacon fitted with the electric light.—Our portrait of Professor Cavill is from a photograph by Messrs. Fradelle and Marshall, 230, Regent Street, W.

TORPEDO WARFARE—H.M.S. "FLAMINGO"

OUR sketch represents one of the latest additions to the fleet at Besika Bay. H.M.S. Flamingo is a composite screw gun vessel of 774 tons, carries three guns, and is commanded by Commander W. H. Hall. In this new class of vessel it has been the aim of the constructors to combine good sea-going qualities, and handiness under sail, with great offensive power for attack, with ram, gun, and torpedo, whilst the vessel is defended against similar assaults by being provided with several watertight divisions of the hull, and with numerous boats, which might act as guard-boats, to ward off a torpedo attack. This class of vessel has also been furnished with a metal spur, which can be shipped or unshipped as thought desirable, the bows being so strengthened as to be capable of resisting the shock of ramming any description of vessel. The sketch represents the ship as she would probably go into action, the outrigger torpedoes being ready for lowering beneath the water, a Harvey torpedo towing on each quarter, and topmasts, &c., sent on deck. The Condor, which has lately sailed for the same station, is a sister ship of the Flamingo, and the pair may be considered most useful additions to our Mediterranean Fleet.

THE GODIVA PROCESSION AT COVENTRY

Every one, we suppose, is familiar with the legend of Lady Godiva and "Peeping Tom" of Coventry, and few we should imagine would thank the busybody archæologists for the information that the dainty little romance rests upon no historical basis. In this hard practical age, however, it matters little whether an event is historical or legendary if it can be made the basis of a financial speculation, and so we have now our annual Godiva Procession, a garish spectacle attracting many thousands to the quaint old town, but which instead of bearing any similitude to the episode which it is supposed to commemorate is the very antithesis of it. The Godiva of the romantic past, who "built herself an everlasting name," rode timidly through the deserted streets of a city whose every window, save one, was religiously closed and curtained, but the Godiva of the prosaic present is but one member of a crowd of motley processionists who march through the town for the express purpose of being stared at and admired.

The modern spectacle is well enough in its way, though there is no uniformity of costume to give it historical value, but one cannot help regretting the degeneracy of taste which could for one moment tolerate the association of such a gaudy pageant with the exquisite story, be it fact or fiction, of that noble-hearted lady who felt for the woes of the oppressed, and who dared to plead for them, and what is more to trust in them.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED

THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. R. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. Parker. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilized world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 20 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

DRAWINGS BY THE ITALIAN MASTERS:
REPRODUCED BY THE
FROM THE
With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. Comyns Carr.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine taste. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. Of the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed-for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, but I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

Topics of the Week

M. Thiers.——Although M. Thiers was so old a man his death took all the world by surprise. Every one had become so accustomed to his name, he was still so immense a power in the politics of his country, that people had almost come to think of him as one of the Immortals. He leaves behind him one of the greatest reputations of the present century. If his career were quite impartially judged, we question whether all the praises that have been lavished upon him this week could be fully justified. It is certain that his influence has not always been so good as it was during his last years. To say that he was in many respects a typical Frenchman is a high compliment; but he had some of the weaknesses as well as some of the virtues of his countrymen. France was to him the universe; he could hardly conceive any interests but hers, and he did not always understand them in the right sense. He flattered her in extravagant terms, and the popular taste he most sedulously fostered was that which has wrought half the ills from which she suffers—her passionate love of military glory. And he would have maintained her greatness at the expense of all other lands. Germany would not have been united to-day if he could have prevented her union; and, had it depended upon his will, Italy would still have been "a geographical expression." These are heavy deductions from his services; but when everything that can be urged against him has been said, the fact remains that there has been no political Frenchman of our time whom his nation is likely to hold in such high esteem. He was enthusiastically devoted to her welfare, and by the energy with which he liberated the territory after the war with Germany he almost atoned for the part he had indirectly taken in bringing on the conflict. It will be for ever remembered to his honour that, after spending his life as an adherent of constitutional monarchy, he did not hesitate, when the altered conditions demanded a change of faith, to declare his conversion to Republicanism. His whole career is a splendid testimony to the power exerted by individual talent when controlled by great aims. Altogether, France loses in him her most illustrious citizen, and his familiar figure will long be missed on the stage of European politics.

London Water Supply.——Every year a population equalling that of a large country town is added to London, and these newcomers bring with them the usual number of horses, cows, dogs, cats, fowls, and canary birds. All these creatures, biped or quadruped, feathered or unfeathered, need water, and so the demand for this indispensable liquid annually increases. Moreover, vast quantities of water are consumed in manufacturing processes which were formerly unknown, we wash ourselves more liberally than our ancestors thought advisable, and we use water as a carrying agent to sweep away refuse matter which they contentedly suffered to stagnate in cesspools. Meanwhile our sources of supply have not materially increased; the Thames is neither bigger nor deeper than it was in the days of the Romans; and, consequently, if population continues to grow, and we go on consuming at our present rate, a water-famine may be imminent at no distant period. Various remedies for this danger have been at different times recommended; a few years ago it was the fashion to advise the introduction of a new supply from the Welsh table-lands; while now we are told that plenty of water is attainable if we bore deep enough into the chalk strata round London. Irrespective of the expense, the chief objection to the Welsh scheme is that the bursting of a pipe or a dyke at any point along a line of transit two hundred miles long might place us in a worse plight than any trouble we are likely to undergo so long as we chiefly depend on the Thames and the New River. As for the chalk, we cannot draw from that reservoir without robbing somebody else. If we sink deep and take quantities of water—as any public scheme must necessarily do—we shall dry up most of the private wells now in existence; nor is it at all certain that the chalk will yield an unfailing supply. Would it not be a safer remedy to make systematic arrangements for catching our abundant rainfall, most of which now runs to waste; for classifying water under two or more descriptions; and for enforcing a stricter economy than at present exists in the use of drinkable water? Water taken directly from the Thames without filtration would be perfectly serviceable for all street cleansing and flushing purposes; while, for superior uses, a constant service, without cisterns, and taps so constructed that water could only be obtained while pressure was applied (payment being made, as for gas, by the cubic quantity consumed), would effect such a saving that the existing supply would be found sufficient for many years to come.

The Situation in France.——It is strange that the death of so old a man as M. Thiers should produce so profound in effect; but there can be no question that it has changed the whole aspect of the problem which France is about to solve. He was the true creator of the Republic. Before he proclaimed his adhesion to Republicanism, it was very generally considered a form of government that must inevitably lead to disaster. When he placed himself by the side of M. Gambetta, there was no excuse for even the most timid expressing serious alarm. It was obvious that a set of institutions of which he approved could not be attended by very tremendous dangers. This was the secret of the crushing defeat of M. Buffet at the last general election; and had he lived, it would probably have been the secret of an equally crushing defeat of the Duc de Broglie. The entire situation is now altered. M. Grévy has been made head of the Republican party; but his is not a name to conjure with. His position is not to be compared with that of M. Thiers; and, in any case, he is not so moderate a politician as his great predecessor. M. Gambetta will be the real leader; and few observers know France well enough to say how he will be regarded by the peasantry. His many concessions have attracted attention; but there is always a question whether they have been quite sincere. Englishmen are prepared to take the most favourable view of his policy, but in France there is a suspicion that if he were in power it would be found that he has been during all these years wearing a mask. If, therefore, Marshal MacMahon acts warily, it is quite possible he may now succeed in securing a large body of waverers. He was weak against M. Thiers; he may be strong against M. Gambetta. Much will depend upon his wisdom and self-restraint. On the other hand M. Gambetta never needed to display more caution than at the present moment; and all who wish well to France must hope that he will rise to the occasion. He can hope to have France with him only by convincing her that she will gain much by his policy, and lose none of the advantages that have been handed down by previous generations.

South Africa.——Those of our Dutch kinsmen, both in Holland and in Africa, who felt indignant at the transfer of the Transvaal Republic to British authority, ought to derive some consolation from the fact, that the annexation has brought all the South African group of colonies more prominently before the home-public than any previous event in colonial annals for some time past. Colonies are like children, they love to be taken notice of; and they resent nothing so keenly as the ignorance or apathy of the mother-country. They are keenly interested in her doings, why should not she take an interest in theirs? Sam Slick, describing a sojourn in wet weather at an English country house, makes it a matter of complaint against the inhabitants that "they know nothin' about Amerikey, and don't want to know nothin'!" and it is just this stolid apathy that so 'riles' colonists. But, as regards South Africa, we must frankly say that she has some leeway to make up before she can hope to rival the popularity of Australia or Canada. The population of Australia is, a few Chinamen excepted, remarkably homogeneous, it is almost entirely British and Irish, and there is scarce a family in the United Kingdom that has not kinsfolk there. The same remark applies at all events to Upper Canada, and in both these colonies the aboriginal population is, as compared with the settlers, a mere handful. Matters are different at the Cape. There the aborigines are numerous, and hold their own against the whites; there has been a large immigration of Asiatic races—Malays and the like; while the early settlers were Dutchmen, whose descendants have not quite forgiven us our conquest, and who, being too numerous to become merged, as in New York State, with their Anglo-Saxon successors, still form, perhaps, the most important element in South African society. Add to this that middle-aged taxpayers can remember a time when they heard almost too much about the Cape and its incessant Caffre Wars, and we need not be surprised that South Africa, except during the brief enthusiasm of the first diamond finds, has lately been rather left out in the cold. Nor do we think that South Africa will readily attract the crowds of hard-handed labourers who have flocked to America. The climate is healthy, but it is undeniably hot, and where there are plenty of blacks ready, however lazily and inefficiently, to do the rough and heavy work, the white man prefers in a warm climate to act as a superintendent. For men with capital and for skilled artisans there are, no doubt, good openings; but, as emigration fields, the South African territories, speaking generally, must be regarded as standing midway between such countries as India, where the white labourer is an unknown being, and Canada or Victoria, where he is in brisk demand.

The War.——Events have lately moved so rapidly at the Seat of War that it is difficult to speak with confidence even of the immediate future. It would, however, seem that we have for the time come to the end of the brilliant achievements of the Turks. They have made resolute offensive efforts; and these appear likely to be followed by a period of temporary exhaustion. In like manner the Russians, after crossing the Danube and advancing into the enemy's country, suffered for some months for their exceptional display of energy. They required rest; and fresh troops had to be brought to the front. Now they are beginning to recover themselves; and it is far from improbable that the capture of Loftcha may be the first of a series of considerable successes. On the whole, however, all appearances point to the conclusion that the war is not one which will be rapidly closed. We cannot now expect brilliant strategy on either side. One of the opposed countries will probably conquer the other by slowly wearing out its strength. If this theory is correct, it is extremely unlikely that the conflict will be brought to an end by the present campaign. It is equally unlikely that the ultimate conqueror will be Turkey. Every one must admire Turkish valour; but the Czar is master of more legions than the Sultan, and mere numbers must in the long run decide the issue. The prospect is a terrible one for the unhappy populations who are now learning what is meant by war in its worst form. It is to be hoped Europe will be able to do something more than merely protest against the shocking outrages which are of daily occurrence; but it is bound to let Russia as well as Turkey know that it cannot allow every law of humanity to be so brutally violated. The Turkish Irregulars deserve all the hard things that have been said of them; but they are in no sense worse than those Cossacks who have taken part in the murder of innocent Mahomedan families, and who encourage the Bulgarians in every species of cruelty.

Oysters.——The Fisheries Act which came into operation the other day, is as far as oysters are concerned, rather of the ridiculus mus order, considering that it emanates from a mountain of evidence, accumulated during years of patient investigation. Oysters are protected, but they are not protected enough. The Committee recommended a close time for oyster fisheries from May 1st to September 1st, according to the good old-fashioned rule that no oysters should be eaten unless there was an r in the month; but the Act cuts this breathing-space short by a whole month, making the close time date only from May 14th to August 14th, and thereby depriving the oyster of half the genial month of August, the most valuable portion of his educational career, the shallow seas surrounding our coast being then at their acme of warmth. Moreover, the provisions of the Act are crippled by numerous exceptions, nor is any proper machinery provided for enforcing its regulations. The half-heartedness of the measure is due, not to the ignorance of the lawgivers who framed it, for they were crammed to the throat with information, but to the well-known fact that when on one side there stands the great inert public, and on the other persons who are in danger of losing the liberties they have hitherto enjoyed, the public is pretty sure to get the worst of it. A more stringent Act would have provoked the wrath of the fishermen and dredgermen, but it would ultimately, by multiplying oysters, have put money in their pockets. We ought, of course, to be thankful for such small mercies as this Act yields us, although, as matters now stand, seeing that either from difference of climate or from lack of the organising faculty, we are unable to imitate the wholesale oyster cultivation of our French neighbours, it is not likely that the present generation will live to see the best Natives once more sold at sixpence or eightpence a dozen.

Ulster and the Home Rulers.——A curious address was issued this week to the "Men of Ulster" by a body calling itself "The Home Rule Confederation of Great Britain." The Irishmen of the North were lectured for the apathy they have hitherto displayed, and urged to begin forthwith a new political career. Their fathers, they were assured, called to them from "unknown graves on the mountain side." "The spirit of '82" was said to "smoulder in many a Northern heart," and "'98" was proclaimed to be "a sterling memory." This being so, the Confederation did not doubt that Ulster would henceforth be "in the front of the national struggle." All this is a little comic, but its insincerity is still more striking. Why should Ulster do the fine things the Confederation expects of it? It is probably the best judge of its own affairs; and if it has held aloof from Home Rule, the obvious explanation is that it does not want Home Rule, but is quite content with the existing relations of the two countries. The address affords a very fair specimen of the general tactics of the Home Rulers. If they brought forward real grievances they know quite well that a remedy would speedily be provided, for there is nothing which England more heartily desires than to make amends to Ireland for the past. Instead of pointing out definite evils, however, the agitators indulge in wild declamation, and make it their business to stir up the worst passions of the mob. Are we not compelled to conclude that the sole disadvantages from which Ireland now suffers are due, not to English tyranny, but simply to a lack of Irish energy? At any rate, we may be tolerably certain that Ulster will not allow itself to be misled by angry addresses. The Irish and Scotch populations of the province understand each other, and it would be a genuine misfortune if the former were to sacrifice solid benefits for the sake of a mere "Will o' the wisp."

SCURRILOUS POST-CARDS.——Post-cards are a great convenience, but, like other conveniences, they have their accompanying disadvantages, and one of these disadvantages is that they place an effective weapon in the hands of those cowardly creatures who love to gratify their own malice by wounding the feelings of others. It is bad enough to receive an insulting letter; still, the contents of that letter need not necessarily be known to any one except the writer and the receiver. But an insulting post-card brings with it the additional sting that before the addressee gets it its contents have been eagerly perused and discussed by servants and others. There can be no doubt that the sending of ill-natured and malicious post-cards is a very widely-spread offence; and a correspondent who has suffered in this way asks us to call the attention of the Postmaster-General to the subject, observing that in his case, as doubtless in many others, the expense and publicity of proceedings at law would only intensify the evil. For our own part we are unable to see what the Postmaster-General can do in the matter. If the ninety-three million post-cards which in the course of a year pass through the hands of Lord John Manners and his subordinates are to be submitted to official perusal before delivery, to see if they contain any offensive matter, the staff of the Post Office will have to be largely increased; to say nothing of the element of espionage which would thus be introduced. The best advice we can give to the recipients of abusive post-cards is that they should treat them as the Galway doctor treated his cold in the head—"with contempt." Malice-mongers will soon weary of wasting their halfpence on slander which falls unheeded.

M. THIERS

LIKE Lord Palmerston, M. Thiers was fresh and vigorous at an age when most men who have attained it are content to sit in the chimney-corner, and allow a younger generation to busy themselves with worldly affairs. Consequently, although halfway towards his eighty-first birthday, he seems to have been cut off prematurely. Moreover, he has passed away at an important epoch in his country's annals. For years past he has been the most prominent Frenchman, and recent events have added to that prominence. A struggle is now in progress between those who desire to retain the Republic as a permanent institution, and those who desire to replace it by some monarchical form of government; and it was confidently expected by the Moderate Republicans that, if Marshal MacMahon failed to satisfy the requirements of the majority of Frenchmen, M. Thiers would once more resume the Chieftainship of the State. These expectations are destined to be now for ever unfulfilled. M. Thiers, who was staying at St. Germain, near Paris, had latterly shown symptoms of alternate restlessness and drowsiness, but his friends were not seriously concerned about his health. He pursued his usual occupations, and on Monday afternoon (the 3rd inst.) he was to have met some friends, including M. Gambetta, at the house of M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, in Paris. He failed, however, to keep his appointment, and next day the news was flashed over France that the veteran statesman was dead. After luncheon on the day in question he had been seized with a fit of apoplexy, and died the same evening.

Louis Adolphe Thiers was born at Marseilles, April 16th, 1797. His parents were poor, his father being either a small locksmith or a dock labourer, but they were fortunate in obtaining for him an exhibition at the public school of his native city, so that he was enabled to receive a good education, and soon distinguished himself by his ability. His first destination was the army, but for some reason or other it was decided to make a lawyer of him, although all through life M. Thiers, despite his short-sightedness and small stature, displayed strong military instincts. At the Bar M. Thiers met with no success, so like many another briefless barrister he turned to literature, which he found a far more congenial pursuit. Charles X. was then treading the same fatal path which led our Charles I. to ruin some 200 years earlier, and the vivacious little Marseilles journalist vigorously assailed the King's absolutist pretensions in the columns of the National. It was at this time that M. Thiers invented the well-known phrase, Le Roi règne, et ne gouverne pas." He presently became a man of note, and after the "three glorious days of July," when Charles abdicated, it was he who proposed that the Duke of Orleans should fill the vacant throne. Under the new régime, through the influence of his friend Lafitte, the wealthy banker, M. Thiers obtained a subordinate post in the Finance Department of the Government, having previously been returned as member for Aix. He soon, however, made his presence felt, he undertook the reformation of the French system of finance, and was acknowledged to be one of the ablest debaters in the House. With several intervening periods of resignation he became in 1832 Minister of the Interior, and in 1836 President of the Council. In 1840 he resigned, having nearly succeeded in causing a war between France and England over the Syrian affair. The chief other events which signalised his tenure of power were the suppression of the Lyons insurrection and the transportation of the remains of Napoleon from St. Helena to France. M. Thiers had already achieved literary renown by his "History of the French Revolution," which he began in 1823, and which he now followed up, being relieved from the toils of statecraft, by his "History of the Consulate and Empire," which was completed in 1862. During the stormy period which dated from the Revolution of February, 1848, M. Thiers was an active member of the Constituent, and afterwards of the National Assembly. At first he favoured Louis Napoleon, but afterwards, having divined the Prince-President's intention of seizing the supreme power, he opposed him stoutly, and was rewarded at the time of the coup d'état by being sent to Mazas prison, and then banished the country. His exile did not last long, and he judiciously spent the interval in visiting battle-fields for the purposes of his history. M. Thiers was now getting well on in years, and, had his lot been that of most men, would probably have passed the rest of his days in comparative obscurity. And, in fact, he was laid on the shelf till 1863, when, to the astonishment of middle-aged men who remembered him as a Minister when they were children, he burst into notice as a brilliant debater in the Chamber, and as an uncompromising opponent of the Government. The power of Napoleon III. was then beginning to decline, and the merciless assaults of the old ex-Orleanist Minister helped to quicken his ruin. M. Thiers opposed the war with Germany in 1870, not as being wrong in itself, but as undertaken at the wrong time. During the disasters of that terrible year M. Thiers rose rapidly into favour with his countrymen. He was the only man of mark who had not served the detested "Badinguet;" he strove, though unsuccessfully, to make terms with Bismarck in October; and he successively visited, in the depth of winter, England, Austria, Italy, and Russia, seeking vainly for an ally against the Germans. He was now declared Chief of the Executive Government, and in February the terms of peace were arranged. M. Thiers strove his utmost, but the conditions were severe. France was mulcted of two provinces, and had to pay a fine of 200,000,000*l.*; the invader to remain on her soil till the last farthing was paid. M. Thiers manfully set to work to raise the money, but his plans were temporarily deranged by the Communalist insurrection of March. He had to fly from Paris, which was retaken two months later by fire and sword. As soon as peace was restored M. Thiers resumed his financial labours; he issued a loan, which was subscribed fourteen times over, and he paid off the tremendous indemnity with such ease that the astute Bismarck almost wished (à la Oliver Twist) that he had asked for more. On August 31, 1871, the Assembly changed M. Thiers' designation to "President of the French Republic," and prolonged his tenure of office. He devoted himself with the utmost energy to the reorganisation of the Army and the evacuation of the territory. Had his countrymen been wise (which politically they rarely are), they would have let him stop in office till now; but the Monarchists became alarmed at the President's acknowledged preference for a Republican form of Government, as being the one which "divided Frenchmen the least;" the various factions combined against him, and on the 24th May, 1873, overthrew him, and replaced him by the Conservative MacMahon. Since then M. Thiers has remained personally in the background; but he has not ceased to be a power in France, and he has since 1870 (whatever may be thought of his previous career) conferred such momentous benefits on his native country that all Frenchmen who prefer patriotism to party will remember his name with perpetual gratitude. On the eve of a great crisis in 1791 France mourned the death of Mirabeau; and now, on the eve of another crisis, she mourns Thiers, who, if not greater than Mirabeau, conferred on her far more substantial advantages.—Our portrait, which is reproduced from our issue of March 11, 1871, is from a photograph by Charles Reutlinger, Paris.

THE GREAT BOAT RACE IN AUSTRALIA

THE contest between Edward Trickett and Michael Rush for the Sculling Championship of the World seems to have created almost as much sensation at the Antipodes as usually attends the annual aquatic strife between the Oxford and Cambridge representatives amongst ourselves.

The betting was greatly in favour of Trickett in consequence of his victory over Sadler on the Thames a year ago, and also because of his effective use of the sliding seat. The race took place on Saturday, June 30, the course being on the Parramatta River, from "Charity Point" to "The Brothers" rock, a distance of three miles and a half. Both men were in good condition and seemingly confident of success. At the start Rush went ahead and kept the lead for something over a mile, but Trickett soon afterwards overhauled him with great ease, and when a mile and a half had been rowed the race was virtually over, Trickett holding it so well in hand that after stopping more than once to wave acknowledgment of the cheering from the banks, he rowed leisurely in a winner by six lengths. Rush was much distressed over the latter part of the course, but he rowed gamely to the finish and was deservedly cheered. The time from start to finish was 23 minutes 26 3-10 seconds. The concourse of spectators was immense and their enthusiasm indescribable. Trickett on returning to his hotel was compelled to show himself on the balcony, where after bowing his thanks to the crowd he chivalrously called for three cheers for his opponent Rush, which were most heartily given. Edward Trickett is a native of Australia, having been born at Greenwich, on the Parramatta River, in 1851. His height is 6ft. 3½ in., and his rowing weight in this race 12 st. 7 lb., though when he rowed on the Thames last year he scaled only 12 st. 1½ lb. Michael Rush, the Clarence River Champion, is an Irishman, and was born in 1845. He is exactly 6 ft. in height, and rows about 12 st. 12 lb.

It is said that Trickett now intends to send to London, challenging the holder of the championship of the mother country to go out and row him over the Parramatta course for 1,000*l.* a side, and that 300*l.* will be paid to defray the Englishman's expenses. The challenge, if sent, will certainly be accepted, but the question as to who will represent this country will depend on the result of the race between Boyd and Higgins on the 8th of October.

H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES AT COWES

A FORTNIGHT ago we published two engravings representing incidents which occurred during the recent stay of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales at Cowes; and we now have a third sketch, depicting a Sunday morning scene on board Her Majesty's yacht Osborne. The Royal party, including the Prince, Prince George, and the young Princesses, with the ladies and gentlemen of the suite, assembled on deck for Divine Service, and of course the ship's officers and company also attended. There being no chaplain on board, the solemn duty of reading prayers was undertaken by the captain of the vessel, the hatchway covered with a flag serving as a reading desk. The hymns were sung by the blue-jackets, led by the ship's fiddler, the music of their sturdy voices floating over the silent waters with magnificent effect.—Our engraving is from a sketch by Lieut. J. W. Haynes, of H.M.S. Osborne.

THE WAR IN THE EAST

BAKER PASHA LEAVING CONSTANTINOPLE FOR THE FRONT

SHORTLY after Mehemet Ali Pasha replaced Abd-ul-Kerim Pasha as Serdar Ekrem, or Commander-in-Chief of the Turkish forces, Baker Pasha, who for some time past had been organising a force of Turkish gendarmerie, was given a command at the front, and ordered to the headquarters at Shumla, together with several of the British officers who were serving with him. Our sketch represents him bidding adieu to his wife on board the Austrian Lloyds' steamer which was to convey him to Varna. "Nothing," writes our artist, "could exceed the tenderness of Mr. and Mrs. Baker's parting. The jovial expression of the officers who were going to the front I can hardly describe, the Turkish officers looking on in wonder at the 'English.' It was a curious scene." Since his arrival in camp Baker Pasha has done good service, and is much loved by his men, who say that the "English Pasha" tells them to "follow," and not to "go on, like many of his Turkish colleagues." In last weeks battle on the Lom he fought with great bravery, and has since been decorated with the Osmanich. Both he and Colonel Briscoe, the chief of his staff, had their horses wounded during the action.

WITH THE RUSSIANS—A COSSACK RAID ON WILD DOGS

HERE we have a company of Cossacks amusing themselves with what in India is called "pie sticking," namely, a raid on the gaunt, wolfish-looking wild dogs which infest the villages and towns of Bulgaria, and which, from their thievish propensities, and the hideous noise they keep up all night, are most undesirable company in the neighbourhood of an encampment.

WITH THE TURKS—STRIPPING THE MOSQUES OF LEAD, ADRIANOPLE

THIS is a scene in the court-yard of a mosque at Constantinople, where the Imams or Mohammedan priests, eager to aid in the prosecution of the "holy war" against the accursed Giaour, have consented to allow the roofs and gutters of the domes of the sacred buildings to be stripped of the lead with which the whole upper part is covered, in order that the metal when cast into bullets may serve to drive the hated Muscov back to his own country.

WITH THE RUSSIANS—THE CAPTURE OF KEZANLIK

KEZANLIK is a picturesque-looking town situated almost at the entrance of the Shipka Pass, and was occupied by General Gourko previous to the occupation of the pass, which we have already described and illustrated. General Gourko commenced operations from Haiukoi by throwing forward a line of skirmishers and cavalry, who marched on for some hours without encountering the enemy's forces; but as the town was neared the advancing tirailleurs were received by a few dropping shots, which increased to a brisk fusillade from the vineyards and orchards on the hills which surround the town. General Gourko ordered the artillery to the front, and a warm engagement ensued, in which both sides fought with dogged obstinacy and bravery. The superior weight and marksmanship of the Russians, however, soon began to tell upon the Turks, who slowly retired from their positions, and by a movement on their flank were ultimately driven from the plain, leaving Kezanlik at the mercy of the invaders. The Turks had 200 killed on the field of battle, which curiously enough happened to be one of the rose gardens for which Kezanlik is celebrated, and from whose produce its far-famed otto of roses is manufactured. This peaceful site was still further profaned by the Bulgarians, who, to the horror and disgust of the Russians, wreaked their vengeance on their former masters by ruthlessly murdering the wounded Turks left behind on the field. To the honour of the Russians it should be said that they tried their utmost to prevent such outrages, and where possible drove the murderers and pillagers away from their foul work with blows of the formidable Cossack whips.

OUR ARTIST'S HORSE UNDER FIRE

"OUR artist's horse under fire" needs little remark save that to obtain good steeds is one of the most difficult tasks of a correspondent in war time, for the arduous duties which the animals have to perform are apt to unfit them for service in a very short period. Both artists and correspondents frequently have to be their own couriers, as is manifested by the recent ride of our artist for three and a half days, in order to ensure the speedy despatch of the sketches of the fighting in the Shipka Pass.

COSSACKS DESTROYING A RAILWAY

THE destruction of railway and telegraph lines is one of the innumerable duties of the ever useful Cossack, who shows great energy and skill in overturning work which may have taken years of labour to plan and construct. The sketch in question was taken south of the Balkans during the recent fighting round Yeni Saghra, the line being the railway leading from the north to Adrianople. The process of destruction is sufficiently explained by the titles.

ASIA—TURKISH OUTPOST IN GEORGIA

"THE Turkish soldier is by no means a helpless being," writes our artist. "He is contented with little, the nomadic instinct is still strong within him, and he soon settles down wherever he is placed. He is enduring and brave also, and even in a lonely outpost in the midst of a thick forest, surrounded on all sides by enemies, as was the case with the advanced picquets of the camp at Tchamchira, he appears perfectly at home and cheerful. The sketch shows one of these advanced posts on the rising ground in the rear of the camp. It is very neatly constructed, and strong to a degree that none but a military man would suppose. It is oval in shape, and the sides are formed in the following manner. Two rows of palisades are driven deep into the ground, and these being wattled together, the space between is filled with earth well rammed down, so that the structure becomes like a solid wall. Outside is a wide ditch fringed with a row of sharpened stakes, and inside a few low huts, constructed of boughs, offer shelter to the men off guard. The sentries are posted in the trees, care being taken to render them as invisible as possible to the enemy by an arrangement of leaves and branches. Small holes are left here and there for the rifles to pass through when repelling an attack. With plenty of material at hand such a defence as this just described is speedily run up, and is capable I am assured of keeping out shells from ordinary-sized field-pieces."

WITH THE RUSSIANS IN ASIA—FUGITIVE ARMENIAN FAMILIES

OWING to the pillage and cruelties committed by the irregular Circassian troops of the Turkish Army, notwithstanding all the efforts of Mukhtar Pasha to prevent them and punish the offenders, there has been a general exodus of the Armenians and other Christians from many of the villages on the borders of the Caucasus to the Russian lines, where they hoped to find a sure protection. Our sketch depicts a train of the fugitives, who are hurrying to the Russian camp with as much of their household goods as they can manage to carry off with them.

THE FIGHTING IN THE SHIPKA PASS

THE Shipka Pass has as yet been the scene of the sharpest fighting of the present campaign. When upon the advance of Suleiman Pasha General Gourko retired from the south of the Balkans into the pass, he was promptly followed by the Turkish commander, who evidently cherished a hope of speedily obtaining possession of the Russian position, and of thus driving the invader northwards into the arms of Osman and Mehemet Ali Pashas. In this, however, notwithstanding repeated attacks and the undoubted bravery of his men, who are without doubt the flower of the Ottoman Army, he has unmistakeably failed, and thanks to powerful reinforcements, brought up by General Radetzky, the Russians still remain in possession the Pass. Our sketches depict the general features of the seven days' fighting, which began on the 21st ult., and which has terminated with the aggregate loss of some 17,000 or 20,000 lives, and with little advantage gained on either side. The best account of the fighting is given in a long telegram from the Daily News correspondent, with whom our artist was in company, and who afterwards had the honour of giving a verbatim report of the action to the Czar. It will give some idea of the arduous duties of our artist when we mention that in order that we might receive these sketches in time for the present issue, he rode hard for three and a half days, no courier at that time being available. To turn to the Pass itself, as may be seen in our sketch, the Shipka Pass is not a pass at all in the proper sense of the term. There is no gorge, no defile between high walls of rock, but simply a section of the Balkans of less than the average height, the surface of which, from the Jantra river on the north to the Tundja valley on the south is sufficiently continuous to afford a practicable road. On either side of this ridge which was held by the Russians are various hollows and valleys, which, however, are not continuous, while occasionally the ridge is flanked by a spur of a mountain higher than itself, furnishing an admirable point whence the Turks could shell the Russian positions. The Turkish infantry, being massed together in the valley unperceived, would thence suddenly attack the ridge with the hope of carrying it by assault, and the Russians at one time, before General Radetzky arrived, were in great danger of being completely surrounded. The Russians on their side would frequently attack the Turkish positions on the heights with varying success—sometimes, as in our sketch, successfully, at others being repulsed with loss, the ultimate result being that the Russians gained possession of the crest formerly occupied by the Turks on their right wing—the Turks falling back on to the next ridge. The above will give a general idea of the seven days' fighting, for the details of which our space compels us to refer our readers back to our weekly chronicle of the war in our news columns.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——It is not yet clear whether the alleged correspondence between Mr. Gladstone and "A Greek Merchant" is genuine or mythical. The Times correspondent at Constantinople says that M. Menelas Negroponte has asked him to contradict the statement that he has published a letter written to him by Mr. Gladstone, but he says nothing as to whether such a letter has been received; besides, there may be more than one M. Negroponte in Constantinople. Why does not Mr. Gladstone speak out?—A great Conservative demonstration took place at Manchester on Saturday. Some 10,000 members of associations in Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Cheshire marched through the streets in procession to the Belle Vue Gardens, where three platforms were arranged for the speakers, amongst whom were the Hon. F. A. Stanley, Mr. Birley, Mr. Wheelhouse, the Hon. Algernon Egerton, Mr. Hardcastle, and several other members of Parliament.—The Home Rule Confederation of Great Britain has issued a manifesto to the men of Ulster, calling upon them to join the movement at once, and thus deprive the English of their strongest argument which comes up in every debate:—"If we were to give you Home Rule, Ulster would draw the sword against the other provinces." The address concludes with a fervid adjuration of the Ulster clans, the O'Neils, O'Donnells, Maguires, M'Mahons, O'Reillys, O'Cahans, and the rest, and a declaration that if the old Celtic race of Ulster will not take the place of honour, theirs by right, there are Scottish Celts who will.—The Dublin Home Rule League have passed a resolution requesting Home Rule constituencies to call on their representatives during the recess to give an account of their stewardship.—Mr. Parnell, the new President of the Home Rule Confederation, accompanied by other members of the Obstructive clique, commenced a round of visits to the various branches of the organisation. They were at Hull on Monday, and at Newcastle on Wednesday. At the latter place a local politician warned the meeting that the Obstructives were touting the country in order to oust Mr. Butt from his position as leader of the Irish party; but Mr. O'Connor Power declared that if a vote of want of confidence in Mr. Butt was proposed he should oppose it both by voice and vote.—Mr. Butt, after consultation with his friends, has decided not to appear before his constituents at Limerick, but to publish a letter expressing his opinions on the political situation.—Sir C. Dilke spoke at a meeting of the electors of Chelsea, on Tuesday last. He criticised the past session, and urged the necessity for a redistribution of political power. On the Eastern Question he said he blamed the past conduct of negotiations by the Government, but could not sympathise with the eulogists of Russia. It seemed unlikely that the war would end this year, and it was therefore the less necessary to discuss the future of the Turkish Empire. Should the break up of the Turkish dominion in Europe come, he hoped that the claims of Greece would not be overlooked, or, in the interests not so much of England as of the Egyptian people, the claims of England to hold rule in Egypt. Lord Kensington, M.P., who presided, referring to Sir S. Northcote's recent speech, said that the late elections in Shropshire, Northamptonshire, and Westminster could not be regarded as tests of the Conservative position; the two counties were Conservative strongholds, and the walk-over in Westminster was permitted by the Liberals because it would have been an ungracious act to put Mr. Smith to the trouble and expense of a contest.—Mr. Gladstone had some more political visitors at Hawarden on Saturday. He spoke to them of the advantages of co-operation in all things, especially amusements, and then turning to the eternal Eastern Question, said that the Turkish Government had put itself beyond the pale of belief, and that he hoped the Russians would earn immortal glory by delivering the oppressed provinces without turning the work to selfish aims.——Dr. Kenealy wants "a million sixpences" (so says the Englishman), wherewith to fight the Whigs and Tories by bringing forward "Tichborne candidates" in every borough. He says that the Magna Charta Society has no money, but does not state what has been done with the subscriptions of the two or three thousand members of whom he used to boast.

MISCELLANEOUS.——General Grant is being received with high honour in Scotland. He has already been presented with the freedom of the city of Edinburgh, and is to receive that of the burghs of Elgin, Inverness, Dundee, and Perth.—The Mansion House Indian Famine Fund on Wednesday amounted to 96,000*l.* —The Lord-Mayor has received a telegram from the Viceroy, stating that the funds will be managed by local committees under the supervision of a central committee at Madras, and that no differences now exist between the Supreme Government and this committee, although their action is quite distinct. The prices of food are still rising, although the agricultural prospects in the famine districts are slightly improved, in consequence of some rain having fallen.—The Hospital Saturday collections were made in London last week; about 150 ladies sat in the streets in various parts of the metropolis with collecting boxes. The amount collected has not yet been announced.—The Sheffield Cutlers' Feast was held on Thursday under the presidency of Mr. David Ward, the Master Cutler Elect.—Very dreary accounts of the weather still come from the North, and from the West of England. In Scotland the heavy rain continues, and the mountain tops are already covered with snow. In Wales roads and railways are submerged, and many buildings have been destroyed and cattle washed away.—The Walker Art Gallery, at Liverpool was inaugurated on Thursday by Lord Derby. There was a great demonstration in acknowledgment of the munificence of the donor, Mr. A. B. Walker, the Mayor, who was entertained at a banquet in the evening. A view of the building appeared in our issue of May 5th, Vol. XV., No. 388.—Some foolish or malevolent persons in America are sending over packets of living Colorado beetles through the post. On Tuesday no fewer than sixteen were found in a box at the Edinburgh Post Office, and on the following day another packet, containing half-a-dozen, was discovered at Dublin.—The blockade of Fleet Street was raised on Thursday, when traffic was resumed after a stoppage of nearly three months.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——Time was when professionals and amateurs crowded to Warwick intent on hearing some news anent the Leger the week before it was run. But nowadays Turf secrets are not long kept, and "the wire" is always so busy conveying intelligence and instructions to and from the remotest corners of the land that a man need hardly leave the most distant grouse moor in order to bear all that is worth hearing and do what business it is in his heart to do. Hence, like Bath before the Derby, Warwick before the Leger is but a shadow of its former self; and the recent gathering was perhaps the most languid and uninteresting ever held under Mr. S. Merry's auspices, both bookmakers and backers being conspicuously absent; indeed, unless something be quickly done it would almost seem that the meeting is threatened with extinction. Not one good field was seen at the post during the two days, and there was hardly a contest of real interest. Both the Cup and Her Majesty's Plate resulted in walks over; while the Leamington Stakes was reduced to a match, in which Mr. Spraggett's hunter Northfleet beat Finis, who started with 5 to 2 on him. This unlucky horse must by this time have almost ruined backers, who on principle —or rather on a principle—follow a horse till he does win. Even the Grendon Nursery, the first two-year-old handicap of the season, could only bring out four runners, of whom Cremation, the fairly-named son of Sutlee, was made favourite and won.—Horsey Yorkshire produced a very far superior meeting at Richmond, where big fields were the order of the day. Thus on the first day nine contested the Trial Plate, won by Scottie; eleven the Richmond Handicap, won by Constantine; and the same number the Cup, won by Telescope. On the same day the spots of Lord Zetland were to the fore in the Sapling Stakes and Easby Nursery, both of which were credited to his lordship by the Speculum and Flotilla colt. Very different to what was the case at Warwick, Her Majesty's Plate produced six starters, including such high-class horses as Thorn and Glendale, who ran first and second in the order given, and according to their respective favouritism. The Belsay Selling Plate and the Burton Welter were both taken by Mr. Barras's Bogie in fields of nine and thirteen respectively—a pretty good performance for one day. The "Black Country" meeting at Wolverhampton concluded the week; and now the eyes of all Turfy men are turned on Doncaster. Presuming the weather is fine, as it generally is at this season of the year, there is every prospect of the coming anniversary of that celebrated fixture being one of the most interesting and enjoyable on record, while the yearling and other thorough-bred sales will be more attractive than ever. Since our last memoranda Chamant has left the front ranks of Leger favourites; and Fontainebleau, who arrived in this country a few days ago, is at the time of writing second on the list of quotations at about 4 to 1, Silvio still retaining his pride of place. His stable companion, Lady Golightly, who has been backed for perhaps more money than any other animal during the week, experienced some opposition at Warwick on the Wednesday, it being rumoured that something had gone amiss with her. It does not seem, however, that there is any real cause for alarm to the supporters of her ladyship.

CRICKET.——As oysters fairly come in, so cricket fairly goes out with the first month that has an r in it. It is not, however, meant by this that cricket has actually come to a standstill, but the "beginning of the end" has shown itself. Yorkshire, like Notts, has been going down hill this season, and at Scarborough has been beaten by the M.C.C. by seven wickets, and by the I Zingari, the county team making only 37 in their second innings against the latter. Except on the ground of the proverbial uncertainties of cricket, to which Earl Beaconsfield's aphorism, to the effect that the improbable is probable, is very applicable, no one could suppose for a moment that success would attend

Surrey, though with blushing honours thick upon her, in her contest with Gloucestershire at Clifton. However, she made 121 in her first innings, while Gloucestershire only marked 172. But the second effort of the Southerners was a terrible failure, for in less than an hour and a half their ten wickets were prostrated for a miserable 53, the bowling of Midwinter and W. G. Grace being "quite too good." It may be noted that even if it can be said that the batting of W. G. has not been so brilliant this season as in one or two former ones, his bowling has eclipsed the exhibitions of all previous seasons, while his general fielding is as perfect as ever.—Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire, the latter of which counties seems earnestly striving to cultivate our national game, have antagonised again at Hitchin, to the discomfiture of the Bedfordshireites.—The match between Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire at Sheffield ended in a draw greatly in favour of the former. This is the last of the inter-cricket for the season.

Aquatics.——The annual twelve-oar match of the London Rowing Club resulted in a victory for Cowles's crew, though they beat Horton's by barely a clear length.—It was a well-rowed race.

Shooting.——The evil weather in Scotland, and moors reduced to the condition of a soaked sponge, have made grouse shooting during the past week a sorry sport, and in many districts an impossibility. The 1st of September, in most parts of England at least, was indeed a "glorious first," both meteorologically and in a sporting point of view, the reports from almost all parts showing a very fair supply of strong healthy birds.

Polo.——It is a matter of deep regret that the accident which recently happened to a gallant officer of the 10th Hussars during a match between the Hythe and Shorncliffe garrisons has terminated fatally. That there is something more than a "spice" of danger in polo must be admitted; but it is so fine a game, and so well suited for cavalry officers, that it is to be hoped that even so painful a catastrophe as that alluded to will not lead to any agitation for the discontinuance of the pastime.

Boxing.——Are "the authorities" aware that what are called "boxing" matches, going on all over the kingdom, are to all intents and purposes prize-fighting under another name?

THEATRES

The new romantic play entitled Liz, or that Lass o' Lowrie's, brought out at the Opera Comique Theatre on Saturday last, has justified the favourable reports of its performance in Liverpool, where it first saw the light some months ago. It is a melodrama; yet its interest does not depend entirely upon excitement. It has that most important perhaps of all features in a work of this kind, a pathetic story leading to a happy termination. It blends the humorous with the serious in the fashion which experience has shown to be demanded by the patrons of this form of dramatic entertainment. The authors, moreover, have the valuable faculty of knowing how to get on with their story, and their scenes of "sensation" are not the mere arbitrary additions which scenes of this sort often are. This, it is true, is not a production of a very high order; with the remarkable exception of the heroine it displays nothing like subtlety in the delineation of character, its villains being of the old deep-dyed and uncompromising kind, and its good-natured people indicating their good nature by familiar and approved methods. Yet there are no glaring inconsistencies in the doings of these people or in the conduct of the story, and their proceedings on the whole excite interest and expectation. In these and in most other respects, this play is superior to most pieces of its class produced in recent times. Compared with Mr. Meritt's melodrama The Golden Plough, recently produced at the Adelphi, this might almost be accounted a great work, and the authors have at least steered clear of the puerile inventions and causeless effects which render the version of Mr. Collins' Dead Secret, now performed at the Lyceum, so perplexing and unsatisfactory. Considerable credit is due to Mr. Joseph Hatton and Mr. Arthur Matthison for the skill with which they have recast in dramatic form the American novelist Mrs. Burnett's novel of Lancashire life on which the play is founded.

The story of Liz is that of a poor Lancashire girl, the neglected daughter of a miner named Lowrie, who has the reputation of being the greatest ruffian in the neighbourhood. Lowrie's villainy does not stop short of murder, or at least of attempted murder, and all this on no greater provocation than an attempt, on the part of a worthy young engineer named Derrick, to save Lowrie's own class from some of the worst dangers of underground life. Derrick, who is the good genius of the story, alternately rebuking hard-hearted, mercenary colliery proprietors, who are careless about the lives of their pitmen, and reading the pitmen themselves lessons in good morals and in political economy, has objected to pipes being lighted in the mines, and safety-lamps being opened for this purpose in the neighbourhood of foul air; he has also insisted on Waddle ventilating fans being substituted for the old-fashioned ventilation by furnaces, on the score not merely of economy, but of greater safety. This is more than Lowrie can endure. Accordingly, the latter lays a scheme to murder Derrick; but Liz is there to watch over the young engineer's life, and to protect him from harm. In pursuit of this object she is more than once in imminent peril. On one occasion her brutal father, blinded with rage at her opposition and with fear of discovery, is about to hurl her into the pit, when Derrick rescues her. On another occasion, when there is an explosion in the mine, and Derrick is known to be under ground, the heroic girl insists on descending with the others to the rescue. The scoundrel Lowrie is slain by his confederates in a dark ambush in mistake for Derrick, and thenceforth matters proceed more peacefully to the end which has been foreseen—namely, the union of Derrick with his generous protector. With this there is blended a pleasing, though not very novel or ingenious underplot; while the sayings and doings of a Lancashire "original," known as "Owd Sammy," a part played by Mr. J. G. Taylor with the humour and sense of character which this excellent actor possesses, and some other minor Lancashire types, serve to lighten the sombre cast of the main line of the story. The main interest, however, centres in Liz, who is no mere virtuous abstraction, but a complex and skilfully drawn character, the lights and shades of which are brought into admirable relief by the fine impressive acting of Miss Rose Leclercq.

The Vaudeville Theatre, owing to the immense success of Our Boys, has long ceased to give any trouble to the dramatic chronicler beyond that of recording the completion of another stage in its interminable career. This week it has reached its 850th representation with apparently no abatement of its popularity. All country visitors go to see Our Boys with what is substantially the original cast, and it appears to be also regarded as a duty incumbent on London playgoers to drop in at the Vaudeville now and then and see it again, for otherwise it may be asked where do audiences come from. While on this subject let us note that Miss Bessie Hollingshead has succeeded to Miss Amy Roselle's part, which she sustains with all the youthful grace and charm which have won her so much favour at the Court Theatre and the Gaiety. Perhaps it is too much to expect that these qualities will outlast the popularity of Mr. Byron's famous comedy, though as Miss Hollingshead is very young there is nothing wildly absurd in the suggestion.

The Mohawk Minstrels.——Mr. Edgar Mowbray, one of the principals of this clever troupe of negro melodists, announces his benefit for Wednesday next, the 12th inst., when the programme will include some of the finest Old English Ballads. The Mohawks are still located in the Large Concert Hall of the Agricultural Hall, Islington.

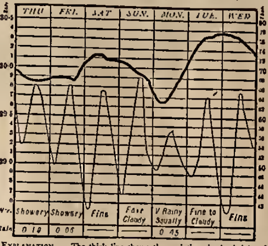
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

August 30th to September 5th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——During the greater part of this week pressure was in a very unsettled state, depressions passing quickly over these islands, and causing the barometer to oscillate considerably. On Monday, the 3rd instant, however, after the passage of a deep depression right over the south-east of England, the barometer rose briskly, and continued to rise until Tuesday evening, the 4th instant, when a fall set in. Temperature has been low for the time of year all through, and early on the mornings of both Saturday, the 1st instant, and Wednesday, the 5th instant, fell to 40° in the shade; while on Wednesday, the 5th instant, the thermometer, on the grass, descended to 32°, and slight frost was formed. The weather was showery on Thursday, the 30th, and Friday, the 31st ultimo, and very heavy rain accompanied the depression of Monday, the 3rd instant; but the other days have been fine, or only slightly cloudy. The wind was west to south-west during the early part of this period; but has been north-west since Monday, the 3rd instant. On the evening of that day it blew strongly. The barometer was highest (30·36) on Tuesday night, the 4th instant; lowest (29·64) on Monday morning, the 3rd instant. The thermometer was highest (68°) on Sunday, the 2nd instant; lowest (40°) on Wednesday, the 5th instant. Total rainfall, 0·70 inches, falling on three days; greatest fall, 0·45 inches, on Monday, the 3rd instant.

Scraps

The Annual Exhibition of the East Tower Hamlets Floricultural Society, under the presidency of the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury, K.G., held last week in the extensive grounds of the Grecian Theatre, City Road, was a decided success.

"Paragrammakleptists" is the title by which literary "borrowers" are in future to be termed by the San Francisco Newsletter. Another coined word, invented by a Kansas editor, is "Czarsparilla," which forms the heading to the war news in his paper.

A curious Sign has been adopted by a native baker at Rupar, proud of his knowledge of English. "European loafer" is printed in large letters over his door, and the baker is evidently quite unaware of the colloquial uncomplimentary meaning of the word.

"What is the Difference between Civilisation and Barbarism?" recently asked a schoolboy of his papa. "Simply this, my boy," was the reply. "Civilisation consists of knowing the art of killing your enemy at two miles distance with a cannon ball, while to kill him with a sabre at arm's length is barbarism."

A somewhat Novel Editorial Difficulty was announced in the Himalaya Chronicle a few weeks since as follows:—"We have to apologise to our readers for the paucity of matter in to-day's issue, in consequence of some of our staff having absconded after having drawn more pay than was due to them."

A costly Map is stated by Engineering to be in course of preparation by the Belgian Government, which has ordered the construction of a new geographical map of Belgium. The work will extend over seventeen years, and will cost 56,600*l.* The first instalment is proposed to be exhibited next year at the Paris Exhibition.

The White House at Washington, in America, the residence of the President, is said to have received its name from the circumstance that after the destruction of Washington public buildings by the British in 1814, the sandstone of the President's house was found so stained and discoloured by fire and smoke as to require pointing all over with white paint.

The Number of our London Boulevards is gradually increasing, and the Gardener's Magazine tells us that the Camberwell Vestry have adopted the recommendation of the General Purposes Committee to plant 388 trees in the Old Kent Road, 24 in Camberwell Road, 86 in Camberwell New Road, and 60 in Peckham Road. But how about the long-promised avenue up the Camden Road?

The Bicentenary of Original German Opera is to be celebrated at Hamburg next January. According to the Musical Times, it will then be two hundred years since the first representation on any stage of an original German operatic work. The piece then performed was called appropriately enough Adam und Eva, oder der Erschaffene, Gefallene, und Aufgerichtete Mensch (Adam and Eve; or, Man Created, Fallen, and Raised Up). The text is written by the laureate poet, Richter, the music by Johann Theile.

A new Species of Scarecrow is described by the Live Stock Journal:—"It is invented on scientific principles, which will not only be a terror to the crow, but to small birds and men. It involves the artificial hawk made from a large potato, and long goose and turkey feathers. It is astonishing what a ferocious bird of prey can be constructed from the above simple materials. It only remains to hang the object from a tall bent pole and the wind will do the rest. The bird will make swoops and dashes in the most threatening manner."

A new Calculating Machine has been invented by a Michigan watchmaker. It contains 2,100 specially-formed pieces, and, including screws and rivets, over 3,000. It works with perfect accuracy, will use a multiplier or divisor of twelve figures, divide one number by another, subtract or multiply, at one operation. The machine gave the answer to the following compound interest question in forty-five seconds:—What is the compound interest of 5,630 dollars 75 cents for twenty years at 7 per cent? Answer—16,158 dollars 47 cents.

The Advertising Nuisance, which so sorely tries the patience of a traveller hurriedly looking for his train in a railway time-table, or a theatre-goer anxious to ascertain the cast of the piece he has come to see, is even worse across the Atlantic, where some of the hotels have their bills of fare with the fly-leaf covered with cards of various business houses. Recently, when a waiter appeared with the inevitable "What will you have, sir?" an angry traveller remarked, "You may fetch me a new set of teeth in gutta-percha, an improved sewing machine with lock stitch, a box of pills, and a pair of calf-skin boots."

A Monster Concert Hall and Winter Garden is to be erected in New York. The buildings will be of iron and glass, will cover an entire square, and will be two storeys high. The first floor will be converted into arcades on the plan of the Palais Royal at Paris and the Victor Emmanuel Gallery at Milan, and there are to be 130 shops, the arcades being intersected by four wide thoroughfares. A garden, concert room, and restaurant are to be arranged upstairs, reached by large double staircases from below, and the orchestra will be placed so that the music can be heard as well from the garden as from the hall. The cost is estimated at 100,000*l.*

London Mortality again decreased last week, and 1,238 deaths were registered against 1,261 during the previous seven days, a decline of 23, being 215 below the average and at the rate of 18·3 per 1,000. There were 20 from small-pox, 17 from measles (a decrease of 12), 26 from scarlet fever (the highest number registered in any week since the beginning of June), 5 from diphtheria (an increase of 3), 19 from whooping-cough, 18 from different forms of fever, and 154 from diarrhœa (a decline of 4). There were 2,469 births registered, being an increase of 173, and exceeding the average by 169. The duration of sunshine in the week was 37·8 hours out of 96 hours that the sun was above the horizon, and the mean temperature was 59·5 deg., or 0·6 deg. below the average.

A Rain Tree is the latest novelty reported from across the Atlantic. The consul of the United States of Columbia writes from Yurimagus to President Prado, informing him that in the woods adjacent to the city of Moyobamba exists a tree called by the natives rain tree, which possesses some remarkable qualities. It is a tree of about fifty feet high when at maturity, and about three feet in diameter at the base, and has the property of absorbing an immense quantity of humidity from the atmosphere, which it concentrates and subsequently pours forth from its leaves and branches in a shower, and in such abundance that in many cases the ground of its neighbourhood is converted into a perfect bog. It possesses this curious property in its greatest degree in the summer, precisely when the rivers are at their lowest, and water most scarce; and the writer proposes that it should be planted in the more arid regions of Peru for the benefit of agriculturists.

A marvellous Botanical Discovery has been made by the Times of India, which tells us that "whilst Professor Tyndall is watching infusions of hay and turnips for some signs of life, the Chinese could give him a plant which undoubtedly evolves into a living creature. They have a plant called ginseng, and this, after growing for three centuries, is inspired through the starlight by the spirits of the hills and rivers; then to burst into the shape and form of a man. In course of time the new creature can leave the earth and dwell among the stars; but the most wonderful part about him is his white blood, which is a sovereign cure for all diseases, and a safeguard against mortality. It is very hard, however, to get this white blood, this divine ichor. To begin with, you must be extremely pious, and must pray and fast for some while before making the attempt. Then the plant-spirit may be deluded into believing that a red paper lamp with seven purple stars is the Great Bear; and he comes near, being a star-worshipper. A net is kept handy, the spirit caught, and his arm cut with a knife of agate, and the drops of white blood caught in a vessel of the purest jade. As a few drops will bring a dead man to life, they are naturally valuable; and we commend them to the proprietor of the Amritaras, the Elixir of Immortality."

Audi alteram Partem.——Mothers-in-law have from time immemorial been the butt of the witty and the sarcastic, but a worm will turn, and one of these much-abused matrons, writing to the Chicago Tribune, thus takes up the cudgels in the following letter which, to say the least of it, is worth consideration:—"I have a few words I would like to say with regard to daughters-in-law. I have seen several articles in the paper against mothers-in-law, but it is very seldom you see one against daughters-in-law. Now, I am a persecuted mother-in-law. My house was a perfect little paradise till my daughter-in-law was brought home. I think where a son takes a wife to his mother's home, if she is a right kind of a woman, it is no trouble to get along. There are some their own parents can't live with. They get married, and go to live with their husband's folks, and if they live like cats and dogs it is all laid to the poor mother-in-law, when they are the evil ones. For my part I have a great deal of sympathy for mothers-in-law, and I think you would, too, if you were in my place. There is one advice I would like to give to young men. Don't marry until you have a home of your own to take a wife to. Don't give your poor mother, who has nursed you in your infancy—idolised you—any cause for trouble; let her go to her grave in peace. How many families there are whose homes are a little Eden till a daughter-in-law was taken in the family?"

ABKHASIAN MOUNTAINEERS

ABKHASIA is a somewhat undefined strip of the country lying between the great Caucasian Mountain range and the Black Sea, west of Swanetia and Mingrelia. It is rich in fertile soil and forests, but the inhabitants are too inactive to reap the benefits and advantages conferred upon them by Nature.

Under Russian dominion since 1823 (their last ruling Prince—Michael—having solicited a Russian occupation of the country), they have in no way profited by the protection of a civilised government, while their neighbours, the Mingrelians, have prospered in wealth and education.

From 1771 to 1823 the Abkhasians were independent, but they failed to better their lot as an independent race, as they have failed to do as the subjects of an Empire which, to quote a hostile witness (Mr. Oliphant) "has improved the material condition, and developed the internal resources of the country." In 1862 a deputation from Abkhasia came to England to implore the protection of the Queen of Great Britain against Russia; that is to say, against a Power which took Abkhasia under its sway at the express desire of the last ruling Prince of this territory.

That Abkhasians should want to get rid of the Russians is not surprising. Doubtless, in the same way some of H. B. M.'s subjects would like to see the backs of the redcoats. But it is better for the world at large that Providence has ordained the subjugation of tribes, whose hand is against every man, to an authority which exacts and enforces observance of laws, and respect of property.

Recent events have shown that the Abkhasians as yet have no idea of either. That is why they welcomed the Turks,—they saw a way to escape from the restraint imposed by Russian rule upon their brigand instincts.

But when the Osmanli tried to subject them to the simplest discipline of warfare, they at once quarrelled with their allies. The latter, however, executed the disaffected among them, so that they found they had fallen out of the frying-pan into the fire.

Five months ago they were living peaceably enough. Then a few emissaries of Turkey came into their country endeavouring to encourage discontent and rebellion, and in May the uprising of the Abkhas tribes took place, and Turkish troops disembarked at Soukhoum Kaleh.

If the Turks reckoned upon the Swanetians, Ossetes, and Karatchai mountaineers joining them on their landing, they were counting their chickens before they were hatched, and might have known better, for in 1856 the Mahommedan tribes of the Caucasus gave no assistance to Osman Pasha, whose expedition to the Caucasus was as great a failure as the present one.

It may be surmised that the Abkhasians only joined the Turks in the hopes of plenty of plunder, for, when they discovered that the Nizam troops kept the booty, they thought about saying good-bye to their friends from over the sea as quickly as possible, and began to treat with Prince Shernoseedje, the hereditary Prince of Abkhasia, a faithful subject of the Emperor of Russia, for their return and submission to the Czar.

However, when the Turks withdrew from the Caucasus, many of them, fearing the just wrath of the Russians, left their country, which has been dreadfully devastated and despoiled in the last few months. Soukhoum Kaleh, amongst other places, is a heap of rubbish.

The Abkhasians are of a repulsive, savage appearance, neglectful of their person, and without much, if any, notion of religion. They wear the common Caucasian woolly peaked hat (papakha), and the thick, shabby, sheepskin cloak (bourka), and live principally on lavàshi cakes made of maize, salted cheese, beans, fruit, and hanseli, a kind of leek which all the tribes of the Caucasus are fond of. They inhabit either underground hovels (saclas), thatched with twigs and straw, or huts raised on poles above the ground.

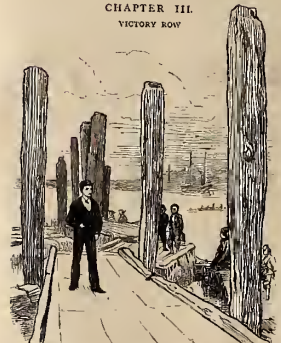
CHAPTER III.

VICTORY ROW



MRS. JERAM was a weekly tenant in one of a row of small four-roomed houses known as Victory Row, which led out of Nelson Street, and was a broad blind court, bounded on one side and at the end by the Dockyard wall. It was not a dirty and confined court, but quite the reverse, being large, clean, and a very Cathedral Close for quietness. The wall, built of a warm red brick, had a broad and sloping top, on which grew wall-flowers, long grasses, and stonecrop; overhanging the wall was a row of great elms, in the branches of which there was a rookery, so that all day long you could listen if you wished to the talk of the rooks. Now this is never querulous, angry, or argumentative. The rook does not combat an adversary's opinion: he merely states his own; if the other one does not agree with him he states it again, but without temper. If you watch them and listen you will come to the conclusion that they are not theorists, like poor humans, but simple investigators of fact. It has a restful sound, the talk of rooks: you listen in the early morning, and they assist your sleeping half-dream without waking you; or in the evening they carry your imagination away to woods and sweet country glades. They have cut down the elms now, and driven the rooks to find another shelter. Very likely, in their desire to sweep away everything that is pretty, they have torn the wall-flowers and grasses off the wall, as well. And if these are gone, no doubt Victory Row has lost its only charm. If I were to visit it now, I should probably find it squalid and mean. The eating of the tree of knowledge so often makes things that once we loved look squalid.

But to childhood nothing is unlovely in which the imagination can light upon something to feed it. It is the blessed province of all children, high and low, to find themselves at the gates of Paradise, and quite certainly Tom the Piper's son, sitting under a hedge with a raw potato for plaything, is every bit as happy as a little Prince of Wales. The possibilities of the world which opens out before us are infinite: while the glories of the world we have left behind are still clinging to the brain and shed a supernatural colouring on everything. At six, it is enough to live: to awake in the morning to the joy of another day: to eat, sleep, play, and wonder: to revel in the vanities of childhood: to wanton in make-believe superiority; to admire the deeds of bigger children: to emulate them, like Icarus: and too often, like that greatly daring youth, to fall.

Try to remember, if you can, something of the mental attitude of childhood; recall, if you may, some of the long thoughts of early days. To begin with, God was quite close to you; up among the stars. He was seated somewhere, ready to give you whatever you wanted; everybody was a friend, and everybody was occupied all day long about your personal concerns; you had not yet arrived at the boyishness of forming plans for the future. You were still engaged in imitating, exercising, wondering. Every man was a demi-god—you had not yet arrived at the consciousness that you might become yourself a man; the resources of a woman—to whom belong bread, butter, sugar, cake, and jam—were unbounded; everything that you saw was full of strange and mysterious interest. You had not yet learned to sneer, to criticise, to compare, and to down-cry.

Mrs. Jeram's house, therefore, in my eyes contained everything that heart of man could crave for. The green-painted door opened into a room which was at once reception room, dining-room, and kitchen; furnished, too, though that I did not know, in anticipation of the present fashion, having plates of blue and white china stuck round the walls. The walls were built of that warm red brick which time covers with a coating of grey-like moss. You find it everywhere among the old houses of the south of England, but I suppose the clay is all used up, because I see none of it in the new houses.

We were quite respectable people in Victory Row. Of that I am quite sure, because Mrs. Jeram would have made the place much too lively by the power and persistence of her tongue for other than respectable people. We were seafaring folk, of course; and in every house was something strange from foreign parts. To this day I never see anything new in London shops or in museums without a backward rush of associations which lands me once more in Victory Row. For the sailors' wives had all these things long ago, before inland people ever heard of them. There were Japanese cabinets picked up in Chinese ports long before Japan was open. There was curious carved wood and ivory work from Canton. These things were got during the Chinese war; and there was a public-house in a street hard by which was decorated, instead of a red window-blind, like other such establishments, with a splendid picture representing some of the episodes in that struggle. All the Chinese were running away in a disgraceful stampede, while Jack Tar, running after them, caught hold of their pigtails with the left hand, and deftly cut off their heads with the right, administering at the same time a frolicsome kick. John Chinaman's legs were generally both off the ground together, such was his fear. Then there were carved ostrich eggs; wonderful things from the Brazils in feathers; frail delicacies in coral from the Philippines known as Venus's flower baskets; grewsome-looking cases from the West Indies containing centipedes, scorpions, beetles, and tarantulas; small turtle shells, dried flying-fish, which came out in moist exudations during wet weather and smelt like haddock; shells of all kinds, big and little; clubs, tomahawks, and other queer weapons carved in wood from the Pacific; stuffed humming birds and birds of Paradise. There were live birds, too; avvadavats, Java sparrows, love birds, parroquets, and parrots in plenty. There was one parrot, at the corner house, who affected the ways of one suffering from incurable consumption—he was considered intensely comic by children and persons of strong stomach and small imagination; there were parrots who came, stayed a little while, and were then taken away and sold, who spoke foreign tongues with amazing volubility, who swore worse than Gresset's Vert Vert, and who whistled as beautifully as a boatswain—the same airs, too. The specimens which belonged to Art or inanimate Nature were ranged upon a table at the window. They generally stood or were grouped around a large Bible, which it was a point of ceremonial to have in the house. The live birds were hung outside in sunny weather, all except the parrot with the perpetual cold, who walked up and down the court by himself and coughed. The streets surrounding us were, like our own, principally inhabited by mariners and their families, and presented similar characteristics, so that one moved about in a great museum open for general inspection during daylight, and free for all the world. Certain I am that if all the rare and curious things displayed in these windows had been collected and preserved the town would have had a most characteristic and remarkable museum of its own.

Victory Row is the very earliest place that I remember. How I got there, the dangers to which I was exposed in infancy, the wild tragedy which robbed me of both parents,—these things I was to learn later on because I remembered nothing of them. I was in Mrs. Jeram's house, with three other boys. There was Jem, the oldest. His surname was Ilex, and as it was always pronounced without the aspirate I thought, when I had learned the alphabet, that to be named after one of the letters was a singular distinction, and most enviable. Jem was a big boy, a good-natured, silent lad, who spent his whole time on the beach among the sailors. Moses came next. I never knew Moses' surname. He was a surly and ill-conditioned boy. Leonard Copleston, the third, was my protector and my friend. The day, so far as I can recollect, always began with a fight between Leonard and Moses. Later on, towards dinner-time, there would be another fight. And the evening never ended without one or two more fights. From my indistinct recollection of this period I fancy that whenever Leonard and Moses came within a few yards of each other they as naturally rushed into battle as a Russian and a Turk. And the only good point about Moses was that he was always ready to renew the battle. For he hated Leonard; I suppose because Leonard was as handsome, bright, and clever, as he was ugly, lowering, and stupid.

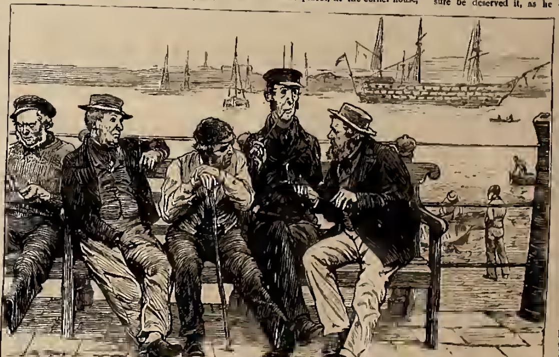
Naturally, at the age of five one does not inquire into antecedents of people. So that it was much later when I learned the circumstances under which we four boys were collected beneath one roof. They were characteristic of the place. The paternal Moses, returning from a three years' cruise in the Mediterranean, discovered that his wife, a lady of fickle disposition, had deserted. In other words, she was gone away, leaving a message for her husband to the effect that little Moses, the pledge of their affections, and his curious collection of china brought from foreign parts would between them console him for her loss. So he put the boy under the charge of Mrs. Jeram, gave her a sum of money for the child's maintenance until he came back again; smashed the crockery in a rage; wept but little, if at all, for his ruined household gods; went away, and never came back any more. Jem Ilex, on the other hand, was the son of a real widower, also a Royal Navy man, and he was left with Mrs. Jeram to be taken care of under much the same circumstances except that he was regularly paid for. As for Leonard, you will hear about him presently. In one respect he was worse off than any of us, because we had friends and he had none. There was, for instance, an aunt belonging to Moses who came to see him about once a month. In the course of the interview she always caned him, I do not know why; perhaps because she felt sure he deserved it, as he certainly did, perhaps because she thought it a thing due to her own dignity as the boy's only relative. She wore a dress, the splendour of whose original black colour was marred by patches of brown snuff lying in the creases. She was a stiff and stately dame of forbidding appearance, and manners which were conventional. Thus, she always began the conversation, before she caned Moses, by remarking, even in August, that the weather was "raw." The monthly caning was the only thing, I know now, that she ever contributed towards the maintenance and education of her nephew. Jem Ilex had plenty of uncles and other relations. One was a harbour boatman, a jolly old man, who had been in the wars; one was a dockyard foreman, and one was a ship's carpenter. They used to drop into Victory Row for a talk on Sunday afternoons when the weather was warm. I used to envy Jem his superior position in the world and his family connections.

I had friends, too, in plenty, but they were of a different kind. Not rich to begin with—not holders of official rank, and unconnected in any way with the Royal Navy, and, which stamped them at once as objects of pity and contempt, they were unable to speak the English tongue except with difficulty. They were big and bearded men; they had scars on their faces, and went sometimes maim and halt; they were truculent of aspect, but kindly of eye. When they came into our court they took me up gently, carried me about, kissed me, and generally brought me some little simple gift, such as an orange or an apple.

Somehow or other I learned that these friends of mine were Poles, and that they had a great barrack all to themselves, close to the walls, whither I used to be sometimes carried. It was a narrow building, built of black tarred wood, with windows at both sides, so that you saw the light quite through the house.

It stood just under the walls, almost in the shade of the great elms. Within it were upwards of a hundred Poles, living chiefly on the tenpence a day which the English Government allowed them for their support, with this barn-like structure to house them. They were desperately poor, all of them living mostly on bread and frugal cabbage soup. Out of their poverty, out of their tenpence a day, some of these poor fellows found means by clubbing together to pay Mrs. Jeram, week by week, for my support. They went hungry that I might eat and thrive; they came every day, some of them, to see that I was well cared for. They took me to their barrack, and made me their pet and plaything; there was nothing they were not ready to do for me, because I was the child of Roman Pulaski and Claudia his wife.

The one who came oftenest, stayed the longest, and seemed in an especial manner to be my guardian, was a man who was grey



A wooden bench was placed along the iron railing near the beach, on which sat every day and all day long old sailors, in a row. . . . They sat still, and sat steadily, in hot weather and in cold. The oddest thing about this line of veterans was that they all seemed to have wooden legs.

when I first remember him. He had long hair and a full grey beard. There was a great red gash in his cheek which turned white when he grew excited or was moved. He limped with one foot because some Russian musket ball had struck him in the heel; and he had singularly deep-set eyes, with heavy eyebrows. I have never seen anything like the sorrowfulness of Wassielewski's eyes. Other Poles had reason for sorrow. They were all exiles together, they were separated from their families without a hope that the terrible Nicholas, who hated a rebel Pole with all the strength of his autocratic hatred, would ever let them return; they were all in poverty, but these men looked happy. Wassielewski alone never smiled, and carried always that low light of melancholy in his eyes, as if not only the past was sad, but the future was charged with more sorrow. On one day in the year he brought me immortelles, tied with a black ribbon. He told me they were in memory of my father, Roman Pulaski, now dead and in heaven, and of my mother, also dead, and now sitting among the saints and martyrs. I used to wonder at those times to see the eyes which rested on me so tenderly melt and fill with tears.

Three or four days in the week, sometimes every day, Mrs. Jeram went out charing. As she frequently came home bearing with her a scent of soapsuds, and having her hands creased and fingers supernaturally white, it is fair to suppose that she went out washing at eighteenpence a day. Something, indeed, it was necessary to do, with four hungry boys to keep, only two of whom paid anything for their daily bread, and Mrs. Jeram—she was a hard-featured woman, with a resolute face—must have been possessed of more than the usual share of Christian charity to keep Moses in her house at all, even as a paying boarder, much less as one who ate and drank largely, and brought to the house nothing at all but discord and ill temper. And besides the food to provide, with some kind of clothing, there was always "Tenderart," who called every Monday morning.

He was the owner of the houses in the Row, and he came for his rent. His name was Barnfather, and the appellation of Tenderart, a compound illustrating the law of phonetic decay, derived from the two words tender heart, was bestowed upon him by reason of the uncompromising hardness of heart, worse than that of any Pharaoh, with which he encountered, as sometimes happened, any deficiency in the weekly rent. Behind him—the tool of his uncomprising rigour—walked a man with a blanket, a man whose face was wooden. If the rent was not paid that man opened his blanket, and wrapped it round some article of household furniture, silently pointed out by Tenderart, as an equivalent.

My early childhood, spent among these kindly people, was thus very rich in the things which stimulate the imagination. Strange and rare objects in every house, in every street, something from far-off lands, talk to be heard of foreign ports and bygone battles, the poor Poles in their bare and gaunt barracks, and then the place itself. I have spoken of the rookery beyond the flower-grown Dockyard wall. But beyond the rookery was the Dockyard itself, quiet and orderly, which I could see from the upper window of the house. There was the Long Row, where resided the Heads of Departments; the Short Row, in which lived functionaries of lower rank—I believe the two Rows do not know each other in society; there was the great Reservoir, supported on tall and spidery legs, beneath which stood piles of wood cut and dressed, and stacked for use; there was the Rope Walk, a quarter of a mile long, in which I knew walked incessantly up and down the workmen who turned hanks of yarn into strong cables smelling of fresh tar; there were the buildings where other workmen made blocks, bent beams, shaped all the parts of ships; there were the great places where they made and repaired machinery; there were the sheds themselves, where the mighty ships grew slowly day by day, miracles of man's constructive skill, in the dim twilight of their wooden cradles; there was a pool of sea water, in which lay timber to be seasoned, and sometimes I saw boys paddling up and down in it; there was always the busy crowd of officers and sailors going up and down, some of them godlike, with cocked hats, epaulettes, and swords.

And, all day long, never ceasing, the busy sound of the Yard. To strangers and visitors it was just a confused and deafening noise. When you got to know it you distinguished half-a-dozen distinct sounds which made up that inharmonious and yet not unpleasing whole. There was the chatter of the caulkers' mallets, which never ceased their tap, tap, tap, until you got used to the regular beat, and felt it no more than you felt the beating of your pulse. But it was a main part of the noise which made the life of the Yard. Next to the multitudinous mallets of the caulkers, which were like the never-ceasing hum and whisper of insects on a hot day, came the loud clanging of the hammer from the boiler-makers' shop. That might be likened, by a stretch of fancy, to the crowing of cocks in a farmyard. Then, all by itself, came a heavy thud which made the earth tremble, echoed all around, and silenced for a moment everything else. It came from the Nasmyth steam hammer; and always, running through all, and yet distinct, the r—r—r—r of the machinery, like the rustling of the leaves in the wind. Of course I say nothing about salutes, because every day a salute of some kind was thundering and rolling about the air as the ships came and went, each as tenacious of her number of guns as an Indian Rajah.

Beyond the Dockyard—you could not see it, but you felt it, and knew that it was there—was the broad blue lake of the harbour, crowded with old ships sacred to the memory of a hundred fights, lying in stately idlesse, waiting for the fiat of some ignorant and meddling First Lord ordering them to be broken up. As if it were anything short of wickedness to break up any single ship which has fought the country's battles and won her victories, until the tooth of Time, aided by barnacles, shall have rendered it impossible for her to keep afloat any longer.

When the last bell rang at six o'clock, and the workmen went away, all became quiet in the Dockyard. A great stillness began suddenly, and reigned there till the morning, unbroken save by the rooks which cawed in the elms, and the clock which struck the hours. And then one had to fall back on the less imaginative noises of Victory Row, where the parrot coughed, and the grass widows gathered together, talking and disputing in shrill concert, and Leonard fought Moses before going to bed, not without some din of battle.

CHAPTER IV.

THIRTY YEARS AGO

Recollections of childhood are vague as a whole, but vivid in episodes. The days pass away, and leave no footprints on the sands, one being like another. And then one comes, bringing with it a trivial incident, which somehow catches hold of the childish imagination, and so lives for ever. There are two or three of these in my memory.

It is a sunshiny day, and, as the rooks are cawing all day in the elms, it must be spring. Sitting on the doorstep of Mrs. Jeram's, I am only conscious of the harmonious blending of sounds from the Dockyard. Victory Row is quiet, save for the consumptive parrot who walks in the shade of the wall coughing heavily, as if it was one of his worst days, and he had got a bronchial asthma on the top of his other complaints. With me is Leonard, dancing on the pavement to no music at all but the beating of his pulse, enough for him. Jem and Moses are always on the beach. I suppose, but I am not certain, that it is afternoon. And the reason why I suppose so is that the Row is quiet. The morning was more noisy on account of the multifarious house duties which had to be got through. We hear a step which we know well, a heavy and limping step, which comes slowly along the pavement, and presently bears round the corner its owner, Wassielewski. Leonard stops dancing. Wassielewski pats his curly head. I hold up my arms: he catches me up and kisses me, while I bury my face in his big beard. Then he puts me down again, lays aside the violin which he carries in one hand (it is by this instrument that Wassielewski earns a handsome addition to the daily tenpence, and, in fact, pays half my weekly allowance), and seeks in his coat pocket for an orange. He does all this very gravely without smiling, only looking depths of care and love almost paternal out of his deep-set eyes. While Leonard holds the orange he places the violin in my hands. Ah! what joy even to draw the bow across the strings, though my arms are not long enough yet to hold the instrument properly. Somehow this rugged old soldier taught me to feel music, and the rapture of producing music, before my fingers could handle notes or my hands could hold a bow. He leaves the orange for Leonard and myself, and disappears. Moses returns unexpectedly, and demands a share. There is a fight.

Or it is another visitor, the Captain. He wears his blue frock-coat with brass buttons and white ducks; he carries his hands beside him, and a stick in them, which drags at his heels as he walks. We do not see him till he is with us. We look up, and he beams upon us, smiling all over his rosy face.

"How is the little Pole?" asks the kindly Captain, shaking hands with us. "How is the other young rascal?"

I have a distinct recollection once of his eyes wandering in the direction of our boots, which were certainly going, if not altogether gone, both soles and heels. And I remember that he shook his head. Also that in the evening new boots came for both of us. And that Mrs. Jeram said, nodding her head, that he—meaning perhaps the Captain—was a good man.

Another recollection.

I am, somehow or other, in the street by myself. How I got there, what I proposed to myself when I set out on my journey, I cannot tell. But I was lost in the streets of the old seaport town. I was walking along the pavement feeling a good deal frightened, and wondering how I was to get back to Victory Row, or even to the Poles' Barrack, when I became aware of a procession. It was a long procession, consisting of sailors marching, every man with a lady on his arm, two and two, along the middle of the street, singing as they went. They wore long curls, these jolly tars, shining with grease, hanging down on either side below, or rather in front of, their hats. Curls were the fashion in those days. There were about thirty men in this rollicking train. At their head, limping along very fast, marched my poor old friend Wassielewski, his grave face and melancholy eyes a contrast to the careless and jovial crew who followed him. He was fiddling as he went one of those lively tunes that sailors love, a tune which puts their legs a dancing and pours quicksilver into their feet. Some of them, indeed, were capering along the line, unable to wait till the "crib" was reached. Also, down the street I saw another exactly similar procession. How was I to know that the Royal Frederick had been paid off that morning, and that a thousand Jack Tars were all together chucking away the money in a few days which it had taken them three years to earn? The old Pole would get some share of it, however, for that was the way in which he earned the money which mostly came to me.

He spied me presently standing alone on the kerbstone, and handing the fiddle to one of the men, hurried across the road, and took me in his arms.

"Ladislas!" he said, with his quaint foreign accent. "What are you doing here? Why are you not at home?"

"Bring him over, Fiddler Ben," cried one of the men. "I'll carry the little chap. Lord! what's one boy? I've had a dozen of 'em at home, somewheres. Now then, messmates——Strike up, Fiddler Ben. With a will, my lad."

"It is the son of my old master and lord," began Wassielewski, holding me in his arms helplessly.

"Bring along his lordship, then," said the man. "I'll carry the noble heart."

The Pole resumed the fiddle with a sigh, and took up his place as band and bandmaster in one.

"Uncommon light in the arms is the noble duke. Many a fo'k'sle kid 'ud weigh more. Poll, our'n 'ud weigh twice as much. Come up, yer Ryal Highness."

I suppose I must have been a very small boy, even for a five years' old child. But the man carried me tenderly, as sailors always do. We came to a public-house; that one with the picture outside it, of the Chinese War. There was a long, low sort of hall within it, at the end of which Wassielewski took his place, and began to fiddle again. Dancing then set in, though it was still early in the morning, with great severity. With dancing, drink. With both, songs; with all three, Wassielewski's fiddle. I suppose it was the commencement of a drunken orgie, and that the whole thing was disgraceful. Remember, however, that it was more than thirty years ago, when the Navy still retained its old traditions. Foremost among these was the tradition that being ashore meant drink as long as the money lasted. It sometimes lasted a week, or even a fortnight, and was sometimes got through in a day or two. There were harpies and pirates in every house which was open to Jack. Jack, indeed, was cheated wherever he went. Afloat he was robbed by the purser; he was ill-fed and ill-found, the Government paying for good food and good stores; contractors and purveyors combined with the purser to defraud him. Ashore, he was horribly, shamefully cheated and robbed, when he was paid off by a Navy bill, and fell into the hands of the pay agents. He was a rough-hided ruffian who could fight, had seen plenty of fighting, was tolerably inured to every kind of climate, and ready to laugh at any kind of danger, except, perhaps, Yellow Jack. He was also tender-hearted and sentimental. Sometimes he was away for five years at a stretch, and, if his captain chose to make it so, his life was a dog's life. Floggings were frequent; rum was the reward of good conduct; there were no Sailors' Homes, none of the many humanising influences which have made the British man-of-war's man the quiet, decorous creature, generally a teetotaller, and often inclined to a Methodist way of thinking in religion, half soldier, half sailor, that he is at present.

It was an orgie, I suppose, at which no child should have been present. Fortunately, at half-past twelve the landlord piped all hands for dinner, and Wassielewski carried me away. He would return after dinner to play on and on till night fell, and there was no one left to stand upon his legs. Then Wassielewski would put the fiddle away in its case, and go back to the barrack, where he sat in silence, and brooded. The other Poles smoked and talked, but this one held himself apart. He was an Irreconcileable, and he refused to accept defeat.

One more scene.

The Common Hard, which is still, after all the modern changes, a street with a distinct character of its own. The houses still look out upon the bright and busy harbour, though there is now a railway terminus and an ugly pier; though steam launches run across the water; and though there are telegraph posts, cabs, and omnibuses, all the outward signs of advanced civilisation. But thirty years ago it was a place which seemed to belong to the previous century. There were no great houses and handsome shops, but in their place, a picturesque row of irregular cottages, no two of which were exactly alike, but which resembled each other in certain particulars. They were two-storied houses; the upper story was very low, the ground floor was below the level of the street. I do not know why, but the fact remains that in my town the ground floors of all the old houses were below the level of the pavement. You had to stoop, if you were tall, to get into the doorway, and then, unless you were experienced, you generally fell headlong down a step of a foot or so. Unless the houses were shops they had only one window below and one above, because the tax on windows obliged people to economise their light. The roofs were of red tiles, high-pitched, and generally broken-backed; stone-crop and house-leek grew upon them. The Hard existed then only for the sailors. There were one or two jewellers who bought as well as sold; many public-houses; and a plentiful supply of rascally pay-agents. That side had little interest for boys. In old times the high tide had washed right up to the foot of these houses, which then stood upon the beach itself. But they built a stone wall, which kept back the water, and allowed a road to be made, protected by an iron railing. An open space gave access to what was called the "beach," being a narrow spit of land, along which were ranged on either side the wherries of the boatmen. A wooden bench was placed along the iron railing near the beach, on which sat every day and all day long old sailors, in a row. It was their club, their daily rendezvous, the place where they discussed old battles, smoked pipes, and lamented bygone days. They never seemed to walk about or to care much where they sat. They sat still, and sat steadily, in hot weather and in cold. The oddest thing about this line of veterans was that they all seemed to have wooden legs. There was, or there exists in my memory, which is the same thing, a row of wooden pegs which did duty for the lost legs, sticking out straight in front of the bench when they were on it. The effect of this was very remarkable. Some, of course, had lost other outlying bits of the human frame: a hand, the place supplied by a hook, like that of Cap'en Cuttle, whose acquaintance I formed later on; a whole arm, its absence marked by the empty sleeve sewn to the front of the jersey; and there were scars in plenty. Like my friends, the Poles, these heroes had gained their scars and lost their limbs in action. Thirty years ago we were only a quarter of a century or so from the long and mighty struggle which lasted for a whole generation, and filled this seaport town with prosperity, self-satisfaction, and happiness. Oh, for the brave old days when week after week French, American, Spanish, and Dutch prizes were towed into harbour by their victors, or sailed in, the Union Jack flying at the peak, the original crew safe under hatches, in command of a middy and half-a-dozen British sailors told off to take her home. They talked, these old grizzle heads, of fights and convoys, and perilous times afloat. I sat among them, or stood in front of them, and listened. Child as I was, my little heart glowed to hear how, yardarm to yardarm, they lay alongside the Frenchman; how a dozen times over the plucky little French beggars tried to board them; how she sheered off at last, and they followed, raking her fore and aft; how she suddenly broke out into flame, and before you could say "Jack Robinson," blew up with all that was left of a thousand men aboard; with merry yarns of Chinese pigtails, made to be pulled by the British sailor, and niggers of Jamaica, and Dutchmen at the Cape. Also, what stories of slavers, of catching American skippers in the very act of chucking the niggers overboard, of cutting out Arab dhows, of sailing in picturesque waters where the natives swim about in the deep like porpoises; of boat expeditions up silent rivers in search of piratical Malays; of lying frozen for months in Arctic regions, long before they thought of calling men heroes for passing a single winter on the ice with every modern appliance for making things comfortable.

Among these old salts was one—of course he had a wooden leg—with a queer, twisted up sort of face. One eye was an independent revolving light, but the other obeyed his will, and once you knew which eye that was you were pretty safe with him. He had a very profound and melodious bass voice. When I passed he used to growl a greeting which was like the thunder of a distant salute. He never went farther than the greeting, on account of certain family differences, which made us shy of becoming too intimate. I learned the fact from a curious ceremonial which happened regularly every Saturday night. At eight o'clock, or in summer at nine, Mrs. Jeram drew down her white blind, if it was not already drawn, placed one candle on the table, and herself between the candle and the window. The natural effect of this was to exhibit to the world a portrait in profile of herself. She sat bolt upright, and being a thin woman with plenty of bone—though the most kindhearted of all creatures—the portrait thus presented was angular, stiff, and uncompromising.

Meanwhile in the street outside sat my friend, "timber-toed" Jack—the ancient mariner with the deep voice and the revolving eye. He was perched comfortably on a three-legged stool lent by a friend, his remaining limb tucked away snug and ship-shape among the legs of the tripod, and the peg sticking out as usual at right angles to his body. There he sat and smoked a pipe. From time to time he raised his voice, and in an utterance which shook the windows of every house in the Row, he growled,

"Rachel! Come out and make it up."

There was no answer. Then the neighbours, who always congregated on this occasion, and took an intense interest in the progress of the family jar, murmured a soft chorus of persuasive and honeyed words, meant for Rachel too—who was Mrs. Jeram. But she never moved.

"Rachel! 'Twarn't my fault. 'Twas her as dragged me along in tow. Took prisoner I was."

"Ah! the artful thing"—this was the chorus—"which well we know them; and they'll take in tow the best, at times; and a little in drink as well."

No answer again this time, but an angry toss of the head which conveyed to the silhouette on the blind an expression of incredulity.

After half-an-hour's enjoyment of the pipe, the old sailor would noisily beat out the ashes. Then we inside the house would hear him once more.

"Then, Rachel, God bless you, and good night; and bless the boys. And, please the Lord, I'll be here again next Saturday. And hoping to find you in a forgivin' mood."

When he was gone Mrs. Jeram would leave her seat and come to her own chair by the fireplace. But her hands always trembled, and sometimes her eyes were wet. For it was her husband, and she could not make up her mind to forgive him the old offence.

That was why, on the Hard, the wooden-legged sailor and I had little or no conversation together.

One day—I was between eight and nine at the time—we were all four on the Logs. The Logs were, to begin with, a forbidden place, and, if only on that account, delightful. But also on other accounts. There was a floating pier there, consisting of two or three square-hewn timbers laid alongside of each other, between posts stuck at intervals in the mud. They had a tendency to turn round beneath the tread of a heavy man, and when that happened, and the heavy man's feet fell in between two logs, it was apt to be bad for those feet. Men-of-war's boats used to land their officers and crew at the end of the Logs; there was a constant running to and fro of sailors, officers, and harbour boatmen. Also, on the left-hand side as you went down this rough pile, there was a space of water some acres in extent, in which lay in orderly rows, one beside the other, a whole forest of timbers, waiting for time, the sun, and salt water together to season them. And if the logs were apt to turn under the tread of a heavy man, these timbers would turn under the foot of a light boy. Judge therefore of the joy of running backwards and forwards over their yielding and uncertain ground.

Leonard, who rejoiced beyond measure to run over the Logs himself, would seldom let me come with him even down the pier, and never over the timbers. On this day, however, we had all four gone down to the very end of the Logs, half-a-dozen ships' boats had touched, landed their men, and gone back again. Jem, the simple and foolish Jem, was gazing in admiration at the sailors, who looked picturesque in their blue shirts, straw hats, and shiny curls. I even caught Jem in the act of feeling whether his own hair behind the ear would not curl if twisted between finger and thumb. Moses was sitting straddle-legged on a projecting log, his boots in his hands, and his bare feet and legs lapped by the water. Leonard and I stood on the pier, watching. Presently there came along a man-o'-war's gig, manned by twelve sailors sitting side by side, rowing their short, deep stroke, without any feathering, but in perfect time. In the stern sat a middy, the very smallest middy I ever saw, no bigger than Leonard, dressed in the most becoming uniform in the world, and calmly conscious of his importance. He landed, gave a brief order, and strode as manfully as his years would allow down the Logs. As he passed on his eye rested on Leonard, and I saw the latter flush.

When the middy was gone I turned to Leonard, and said with the enthusiasm of admiration, "Leany, when I grow up I shall be a middy, like that."

A small thing to say, and, indeed, the grandeur of the boy and his power overwhelmed me for a moment, else I ought to have known, at eight years of age, that children living with charwomen on charity are not the stuff out of which officers of the Royal Navy are generally manufactured.

"Ah! yah!" roared Moses, tossing up his legs.

"What are you laughing at?" cried Leonard, in a rage.

"Ah! yah!" he repeated. "Hunchback! Hunchey in a uniform, with a sword at his side."

I declare that up to that moment I had no more consciousness of being deformed than I had of Hebrew. I suppose that in some dim way I knew that I was differently shaped—smaller than Leonard, that my clothes were not such as he could wear, but not a thought, not a rough suspicion that I was, by reason of this peculiarity, separated from my fellows. Then all of a sudden it burst upon me. Not in its full misery. A hunchback has to grow to manhood before he has drunk the whole of the bitter cup; he has to pass through the years of school life when he cannot play like other boys, nor run, nor jump, nor fight like them, when he is either tolerated or pitied. He has to become a young man among young men, to realise that he is not as they are; to look on envying while they rejoice in the strength and beauty of their youth; to hear their talk of girls and sweet looks and love, while all girls look down upon him, he foolishly thinks, with contempt. I did not feel the whole misery at once. I only realised, all of a sudden, that I was disgraced, that the grandeurs which I envied were not for me, that I was to be despised for my misfortune—and I sat down in this sudden misery and cried aloud.

A moment afterwards there was a fight. Leonard and Moses. They fought on the narrow log. Leonard was the pluckier, but Moses was the stronger. The sailors in the gig looked on and laughed, and clapped their hand. Through my shameful tears I only saw half the duel. It was terminated by the fall of both into the water, one on either side the Logs. The water was only two or three feet deep, and they came up, face to face, and driving fists at each other across the eighteen-inch plank. It was Jem who stopped the battle, stepping in between the combatants, and ordering in his rough way that both should get out of the water and fight it out on dry land.

"He called me Hunchback, Leonard," I gasped, holding his hand as he ran, wet and dripping, through the streets.

"Yes, Laddy," he replied. "Yes, Laddy, he's a cub and a cur, and a thickheaded fool. But I'll let him know to-morrow."

"And you won't let him call me Hunchey, Leonard?"

"Not if I have to fight him all day long, Laddy. So there."

But next day's fight, if it was begun, was never finished, because in the afternoon we both, Leonard and I, walked away with the Captain, each holding one hand of his, Leonard carrying his stick. And when we got to the Captain's it was explained to us that we were to stay there.

THE PRIVATE SOLDIER

IV.

Recruiting is limited by certain conditions of age, height, and proportions, and the recruit must not only be willing to enlist, but he must also be able to satisfy the medical authorities that he possesses the necessary physical qualifications, and is in good health. The age for cavalry, infantry, and artillery, is from eighteen to twenty-five. For the heavy cavalry, which includes the 4th and 5th Dragoon Guards and the 1st and 2nd Dragoons, the height is from 5 ft. 8 in. to 5 ft. 11 in., and the chest measurement from 34 to 35 inches. For medium cavalry, which includes the regiments of Dragoon Guards not already mentioned, the 6th Dragoons, and the Lancer regiments, the height is from 5 ft. 7 in. to 5 ft. 9 in., and the chest measurement 33 to 34 in. For the light cavalry the recruit need only reach 5 ft. 6 in. to 5 ft. 8 in., with a chest measurement of 33 to 34 inches.

In the Artillery, the gunners are taken from 5 ft. 7 in. and upwards, though a "short gunner" standard of 5 ft. 5½ in. was introduced some months ago as a tentative measure. A gunner should be strong, as some of his duties require the exercise of considerable muscular power. The drivers are under 5 ft. 6½ in., with a chest measurement varying according to height and age.

Men are passed for the Infantry from 5 ft. 4½ in. and upwards, with a chest measurement of from 33 to 35 inches.

For the Engineers men must be skilled tradesmen of good character, and are taken from 5 ft. 6 in. and upwards.

These are approximately the general physical requirements, and the doctor makes a careful medical examination for constitutional or physical defects. If the recruit passes he is sent to join a regiment, but he has still to be finally approved of at its headquarters. If he is accepted, he is posted to a company, his colour-sergeant places him under the care of an old soldier, and he may now be said to have commenced his career. He enters upon its actual advantages at once, and is entitled to look for greater ones in prospective, provided he conducts himself well.

In considering the pay of the soldier it must not be forgotten that it only represents part of what he receives from the State, and that subject to one or two small deductions it is practically what he has to spend upon himself—or pocket-money. We have not space, and it is not necessary, to give the pay of every rank in every branch of the service, but we may mention that in the infantry it ranges between a shilling a day for a private soldier, and 2*s.* 1*d.* for a sergeant; in the cavalry, between 1*s.* 2*d.* and 2*s.* 5*d.*; in the artillery, between 1*s.* 2½*d.* for a driver in a field battery to 2*s.* 11*d.* for a sergeant, the horse artillery receiving slightly more; and in the Royal Engineers between 1*s.* 1½*d.* and 2*s.* 11½*d.*, or 1*s.* 4*d.* and 3*s.* 3*d.* There are, of course, higher rates of pay and allowances for special appointments, and, besides this, additional pay of from one penny to sixpence a day is granted to soldiers for good conduct. Sergeants and corporals, too, are granted additional pay after two years' service in those ranks, and special pay is allowed to a certain number of lance-sergeants and lance-corporals. We stated that this daily pay was subject to certain deductions, and as it is impossible to give more than one instance, we may take that of the infantry soldier receiving a shilling a day. The Government give the soldier a free ration, but he has to buy for himself his "small rations," or extra messing, which may be called "groceries," and which amount to about 3*d.* a day. He has also to pay a halfpenny a day for washing, a penny a month for haircutting, a penny an article for marking. The barrack damages for which he has to pay vary from threepence to fourpence a month in barracks, but marching out barrack damages amount to more, perhaps from a shilling to eighteenpence per head.

Thus the soldier has from sixpence to eightpence a day to spend in any way which pleases himself, after providing for all necessaries. The sum may appear small, but it is probably more than nine out of ten men in the army could afford before they entered it. No doubt they did throw away more, but it was, perhaps, at the cost of the real necessaries of life, and much of the health, comfort, and accommodation which a soldier enjoys. We do not say that we do not wish to see the soldier receive more, but we think he is not very badly off, and, at any rate, quite as well off as a great many hardworking men in receipt of higher pay and in a better social position. In fact, it might be almost as well if some of the wilder characters had not quite so much to spend, as they manage to get themselves into trouble pretty frequently even upon that moderate allowance. The pay has been twice raised in the last ten years or so, and is quite enough for a man of indifferent character. We think that the money rewards offered to good men might be increased, at any rate till the day comes when, it is said, we shall offer such inducements that we shall be able to reject all doubtful characters. But as the sum now offered is practically during probation, for, as we mentioned above, the well-behaved soldier is granted additional pay, we think that a shorter probation before getting an advance would be effectual, and that the scale of this advance might be raised with advantage. Many more steady and respectable men would join if they knew that at the end of six months they would be in receipt of higher wages, whilst the knowledge that it was attainable would certainly not drive away the class that are at present driven to recruiting as a last resource. Unless we are prepared to offer such a sum as will give us the pick of the lower middle and working classes, it would seem better to raise the pay of men more promptly after they had entered the army, if their conduct deserved it.

There should be no stinting in this matter; if we are not yet able to bid more highly for recruits, the made soldier, who has proved himself worthy his hire, should be liberally paid. Besides, it seems that the present rate of pay is sufficient to attract the quantity, and will be ample for some years to come. What is wanted is quality. It would therefore appear unnecessary at present to raise the pay of good and bad alike, and anything which we can induce the Government to spend in excess should be devoted to rewarding the deserving. These, with better prospects, would come forward in increased numbers, and raise the total number of enlistments, if more men are wanted, whilst it would give an increased power of selection if the ranks were nearly full. If it were possible that we could ever have an army composed entirely of men of good character, by merely offering sufficient wages to attract the needful number of recruits, something might be said in favour of adopting this plan. But in every flock there will be black sheep, and surely, till the decreased value of money renders it necessary to raise the pay of young soldiers all round, it would seem better to prove them first, and then to reward them liberally and speedily; in other words, payment by results. If it were possible for the enlisting sergeant, the recruiting officer, or the colonel of a regiment to determine at a glance the character and future career of every recruit who presented himself, there could be no objection to offering high pay at once. But as it is impossible thus to discount a career in advance, it is perhaps better that an improved system of selection should prevail. You can cut a stick shorter, but we do not know that it is possible to cut it longer. It is easy to reduce a man to a lower class, and to curtail his privileges for misbehaviour; but it is not so easy to pay untried men highly and still provide adequate rewards for those whose good conduct deserves them. For it would be difficult to persuade the nation to double its expenditure at one operation, as in such a case it would be necessary to do; but the thin end of the wedge may be introduced, which may open the way to the inevitably higher expenditure which will have to be incurred. The country will scarcely object to pay a fair price for a good article; but it would like to be assured as to its excellence. If the Army contains bad characters by the thousand, it also comprises within its ranks numbers whose value to the State is not to be reckoned pecuniarily. To induce the latter to remain in the service, lending the weight of their example, a very little more encouragement would suffice, as they are not governed solely by sordid considerations. Whatever money can be spared, the larger proportion should be devoted to rewarding tried men. If once this principle is admitted and acted upon, there will be no lack of recruits.

The attraction of a race depends upon the value and number of prizes, and whereas upon the Turf the horses that have no chance of winning outright are sometimes withdrawn, it should be the object of our rulers to provide that in the Army race there shall be no "scratchings," and that all who run up well shall be certain of a prize.

New Music

Messrs. Wood and Co.——There is no form of concerted or choral music more generally useful and satisfactory than the "solo with chorus" which enables the prima donna or primo tenore of a private circle to take the lead, supported by her or his subordinates. We recommend this branch of choral or four-part composition to the attention of our musical composers who, on their holiday tours, may hear some charming effects of simple harmony (high up on the mountains), which may be reproduced (without scenic effects) during the coming winter season at home. A pleasing illustration of the above-named useful school is "I Hear Sweet Voices," a sacred song for solo, and ad libitum chorus, music by H. S. Roberts, words anonymous.—Two pretty pieces for the pianoforte, to be learnt by heart and played (with applause) when occasion demands, are "Wavelets," and the "Knight Templar's March," by Karl Schröder.—As to No. 10 of "Sunbeams" (Weber's last waltz) it is the weakest of the series, and proves that F. Percival cannot write for juvenile fingers; he should try something more advanced,—the gift of simplifying great works is vouchsafed but to very few musicians.—A useful ballad for a mezzo-soprano is "The Old Cottage Door," music by Louisa Gray; words by F. H.; the compass is from E on the first line to E on the fourth space.—A very easy transcription of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," by J. T. Trekell, will be found useful for school practice, but will add nothing to his reputation as a transcriber. Far more effective is a transcription of Wagner's "Pilgrim's Chorus," by Immanuel Liebrich.—No. 8 of "Sunbeams" ("Love's Ritornella," by T. Cooke), is the most feeble of the series arranged by F. Percival, who can do his work very much better.

Messrs. Witt and Co.——One of the most prolific and diligent composers of the period is Heinrich Hofmann, from whom we have just received no less than nine songs, and some four times that number of pianoforte pieces, all more or less meritorious. Some singers will say that the accompaniments are too difficult for ordinary songs, but a little steady practice will soon overcome this difficulty, even though the singer be his or her own accompanyist. "Serenade" (Ständchen), "The Troubadour," and "May Time," are three really charming songs for a tenor, the compass but one octave (from G to G); "The Dawn of Spring" is a pretty song for a soprano, as is also "A Gondola Song" for a high baritone. For the above-named songs M. X. Hayes has supplied the excellent English translations from the German, whilst for the remaining four Lewis Novra has successfully fulfilled this task, more especially well with the graceful poetry of "The Lover's Garland" and "The Floweret's Love Test," the former song for a tenor, the latter for a mezzo-soprano. "Beloved" and "United" are the least satisfactory of the entire group; both are of medium compass.—"Five Characteristic Pieces" for the pianoforte are brief but clever morceaux quickly learnt, but not soon forgotten.—Two books of pianoforte duets, entitled "Laudler," each containing six showy and original compositions in various keys, together with "Seven Pianoforte Duets on Original Hungarian Melodies;" "Silhouettes from Hungary" (Book II.), and two books of "New Hungarian Dances" (also duets), will supply plenty of work and amusement for the autumn evenings in the home circle.—Of a more simple and facile description than the above, but pleasing in the extreme, are "Eight Characteristic Pieces for the Pianoforte," by Franz Behr; it is difficult to decide which is the prettiest of the series—"Evening Song" and "Birdie's Message" (Book II.) are little gems in their way.—Two very brilliant and somewhat difficult pieces for the pianoforte are "Gondolière" and "Scène Triomphale" from Halévy's opera, La Juive; the first is an original composition, the other a transcription by C. Baronius.—The most learned of pianistes are often at a loss when asked to play something during the many odd five minutes which occur in society, especially in the country: scores of such little "stop-gaps" (we trust that sensitive composers will not take offence at this designation) come daily under our notice, exactly suitable for these passing minutes, and calculated to linger on the ear during and long after dinner to the exclusion of more classical themes. Under this head may be classed "Tonbilder" and "Gedankenblatter," two series of pianoforte morceaux (in the strict sense of the term) each one more or less pleasing.—A somewhat bombastic but showy pianoforte piece is "The Hussar's Return," a Festival March by Fritz Spindler.—It is really perplexing at times under what designation to class such elaborate instrumental compositions as "A Woodland Serenade," which is really a pianoforte solo with vocal accompaniment, the poetry translated from the German by M. X. Hayes, music by C. Reinecke.

Note.——The composer of "Der Ritter und der Bodensee," noticed in our last issue, is Mr. Algernon Ashton, not Acton. The words of the song, "The Roses Weep," reviewed in the same number, are by Mr. Edward Oxenford, not by E. C. Essex, the composer of the music.

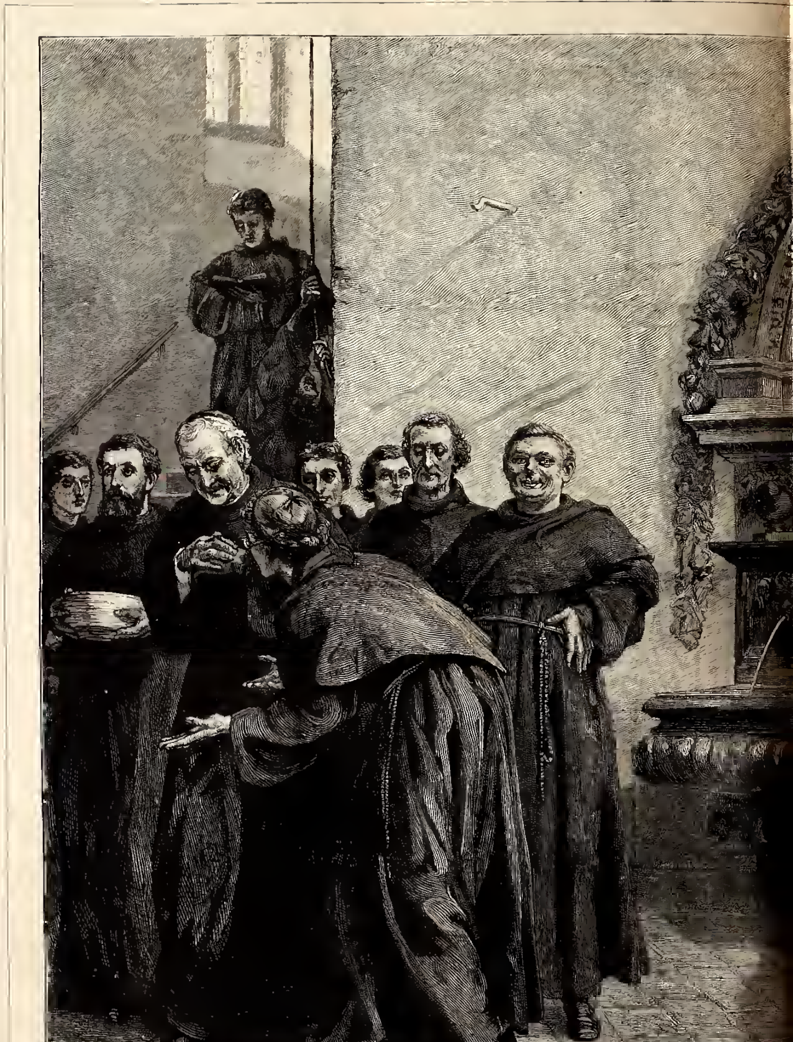
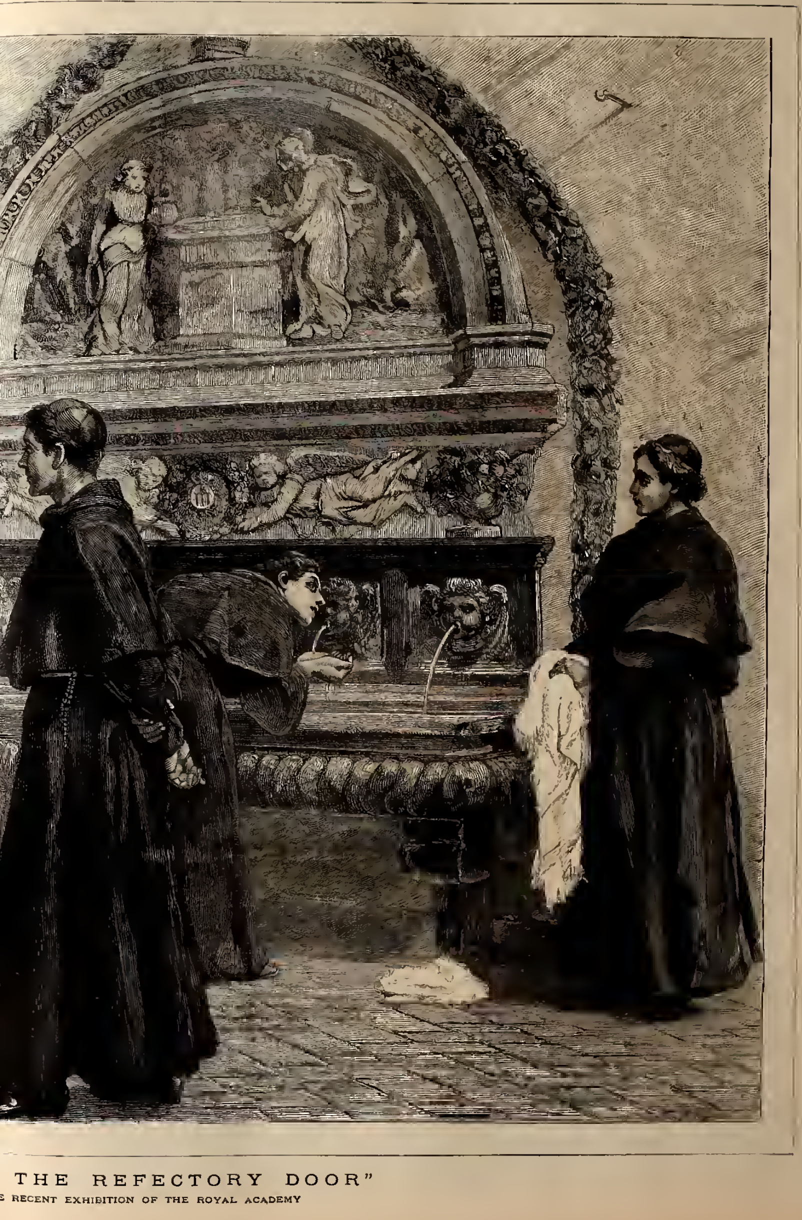
The Famine in India.——On the 20th of July last there died at Ranipett, in the Madras Presidency, Mr. Ernest Edward Mason, an Old Westminster boy, the son of Mr. R. H. Mason, a gentleman well known in London, who sought employment in the Famine Relief Camp of the Madras Presidency. Mr. Mason had been English Secretary in the Imperial Treasury of Japan, and coming home at Christmas, he determined upon going to Madras, where there was work to be done. The Duke of Buckingham placed 6,000 people under Mr. Mason's charge, where he laboured with considerable zeal, and his one fear and anxiety was as to the appearance of cholera in his camp. Seventeen cases did appear, which were isolated by Mr. Mason, who unfortunately was himself seized by the destroyer, and died in a few hours.



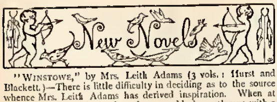
"DINNER TIME: OUTSID

FROM THE PICTURE BY F. W. W. TOPHAM IN



THE REFECTORY DOOR"

E RECENT EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY



"Winstowe," by Mrs. Leith Adams (3 vols. : Hurst and Blackett.)—There is little difficulty in deciding as to the source whence Mrs. Leith Adams has derived inspiration. When at the second page of the book we have an elderly gentleman with a green umbrella holding a hand-to-hand encounter with the wind, which "whistled round the corner of Long Lane as if it were in a very bad temper indeed, and wrestled hard to get the green umbrella altogether, or, failing that, to turn it inside out for spite," we feel at once that the fancy has had its birth in a conscious or unconscious imitation of familiar tricks of style of Dickens. It is his influence too that is apparent enough in such characters as the cheery, benevolent, and slightly eccentric David Earle, the elderly gentleman aforesaid; Abraham Beams, the office boy; and the lame clerk, Jim Dutton, with his passionate attachment to his young master, the hero—all of them pale reflections of well-known figures in the great novelist's stories. Of "Winstowe" there is not very much to say in the way either of praise or blame. It is very fairly readable as novels go, and has some good scenes, as the fire and the escape of the two children in Vol. I.; but there is a vein of sentimentalism in it which soon becomes cloying, and it would have gained by judicious curtailment. It turns chiefly on the fortunes of one William Snow—so called from the aspect of nature when he came into the world—a little foundling whose origin is wrapped in mystery, though he is believed to be of gentle blood and born in wedlock, who is adopted by Mr. Earle and educated as his own son, and who ultimately turns out to be grandson and heir to a wealthy and tyrannical Scotch baronet, who can trace his pedigree back to the year 1104, according to the author, though perhaps Mr. Freeman might have his doubts on the point. The way in which the discovery is led up to by what seems for a long time a vexatious and purposeless digression is a rather clever piece of workmanship. Of William Snow's, or rather William Mallinger's, love troubles there is no need to say more than that the lady of his heart seems insipid, and that he is one of the most unexacting and self-sacrificing of lovers it ever entered into the heart of a lady-novelist to depict in fiction, and we are afraid it would take her a hard search to find anything to match him in fact. Here and there Mrs. Leith Adams gives us a decidedly humorous touch, as when the old butler, told by Mr. Earle that the black-edged letter, which has been noted in the hall, has brought him bad news from India, answers, "That's what we was respectfully afraid of, sir;" and in Martha Dutton's lament that her drunken husband had not lived to share in her prosperity. "What a natur he had—that is, out o' liquor; and even at his worst, when he'd drunk the shoes off the children's feet, and didn't know no more than the child unborn which end he stood upon, he wasn't like a many—he'd just give yer a black eye, or something simple of that sort; none of your wiciousness, none of your kickings, and stampin' on yer with his boots on." Altogether "Winstowe," though it cannot stand high as a novel, may pass muster not discreditably, and if it is a first work, as would seem the case, its author may have it in her to do better another time.

"The American," by Henry James, Junior (Boston: Osgood and Co.: Trübner).—Christopher Newman, who has made a very large fortune in the "Far West," not so much because he was particularly eager after money, as because making money seemed the natural course for his activity to take in that part of the world, comes to Paris at five-and-thirty, intent on getting all the good that Europe has to give him. An important—he comes to think in time the crowning—item in this good will be a perfect wife; and he finds a lady who, he believes, might be this in Madame de Cintré, a young widow of twenty-five, a member of one of the oldest and proudest families of the Faubourg St. Germain. He wins the lady's heart, and gains the consent—reluctantly given, it is true—of her mother and elder brother to her marriage with him, in spite of his having been defiled by trade. Then—on grounds which we imperfectly understand—this consent is revoked; and—on grounds which we understand a great deal less—Madame de Cintré holds herself bound to submit to the decision of her family; takes a broken-hearted farewell of her lover; and goes into a Carmelite Convent. Such is the story, which, as a story, cannot be pronounced very attractive. But the sketches of Parisian life are clever and well-executed, and Mr. James talks well and with insight about his characters, though he hardly makes us believe in them as real. Perhaps, artistically speaking, the best among them is the astute Mademoiselle Noémie Nioche, detestable little adventuress as she is. Madame de Cintré, we incline to think, might have been a fine conception had she been worked out, but as here shown to us she is hardly more than a shadow. Still, the book is not without power of a kind.

"The Great Gulf Fixed," by Gerald Grant, author of "Coming Home to Roost," &c. (3 vols.: Tinsley).—Having by dint of heroic efforts forced our way through the first volume of this work—arduous as the undertaking proved—we are in a position to state that the remainder of the tale is somewhat less dreary, though the improvement can hardly be called very marked. The "Great Gulf" would seem to be the gulf which—in the author's eyes—separates the "idle" class from the classes which have in one way or another to work for a living. The hero apparently belongs to the former; but is ultimately found to have been substituted at birth for the rightful heir; and losing name and fortune is consoled by the love of the heroine, who had formerly refused him, believing that he looked down on her and her family from his exalted station as a squire. The book may not be absolutely foolish, but it is hardly worth reading.

Of "The Vandeleurs of Red Tor: A Tale of South Devon," by Theodore Russell Monro (Samuel Tinsley), it seems enough to say that it is overcrowded with commonplace and indifferently-drawn characters, is of slight interest, and is largely concerned with topics of an objectionable nature.

TRAVELLING IN WALES

Most tourists in Wales confine themselves either to North or South, or the region which is now popularly called Middle or Central Wales. They take the South Wales line, now a portion of the Great Western, and go to Milford, its terminus, or, at all events, to the favourite watering-place of Tenby. For North Wales they generally make Chester the nearest point of departure, and go on to Bangor for the Menai Straits, and thence to Holyhead. Every one ought to make this journey for the sake of contemplating the great engineering triumphs of the line. It is something to pass through the tubular bridges of Conway and over the Menai water. Formerly it was a perilous journey to travel along the high road that passed over the Penmaenmawr mountain, the last spur of Snowdonia, descending sheer into the sea. In the Menai Straits, before the building of the Suspension Bridge, the mails would sometimes be lost and the passengers all drowned. It is curious that the Suspension Bridge, which was built by Government, is only used locally, and the Tubular Bridge, which is now used for imperial purposes, is the property of a private company. But one object of this paper is to recommend ingenuous readers not to confine their travels either to North or South, but to travel through and examine the Principality in its entirety. A second is to recommend them to desert the frequented iron highways as soon as may be, and strike out paths for themselves across country, and from north to south, or better, from south to north.

In this case there is an extremely interesting graduation of scenery. We pass, so to speak, through an ever-shifting diorama of scenery from one zone of view to another. In South Wales, in close neighbourhood to great industrial towns, Newport, Cardiff, Swansea, we have cliffs and castles, romantic bays and valley gorges. Such a line as the Taff Vale line takes us northward through a region where great natural beauty is strongly contrasted with the pits and mines, and the colliery population, where rows of houses rise in terrace upon terrace along the hill-sides. Then we reach Central Wales, whose hills form the great watershed of the Principality. There is a whole cluster of inland watering-places, such as Llandrindod and Llangammarch, of a quaint, peculiar character, which reminds some travellers of Harrogate in scenery and Scott's representation of St. Ronan's Well in society. Aberystwith, beneath its castle and on its noble bay, is a favourite watering-place for the Welsh, and is a great outlet for the people of Birmingham, who are especially fond of resorting hither. The scenery of a great deal of this region is rather that of North than South Wales. This is especially the case if we are out salmon fishing among the upper waters of the Severn in Montgomeryshire. Then the character of the scenery quite changes when we get among the billowy ocean of mountains in North Wales. Here we find in perfection those small exquisite Welsh valleys, which poets, and painters, and philosophers—Edmund Burke is an instance of the last—have declared to be the loveliest sights in the world. Here are the huge mountains to be climbed, with their vast panoramic prospects of peaks, and passes, and lynns, and, across the waters of St. George's Channel, of the Isle of Man and the Wicklow Mountains. On the top of Snowdon you ought to have Mr. H. B. Biden's "All Round Snowdon," as a companion to "Murray" or "Black," or the "Gossiping Guide" (Roberts). For thorough change of scene and benefit to health, take the unfrequented paths, and be content to take much exercise, fare roughly, and take things as you find them. It is a real deprivation not to be able to understand Welsh, as you often find yourself in localities where nothing but Welsh is spoken. The Welsh language is full of life and energy. It is essentially the language of eloquence and music. All those names which so perplex the ordinary tourist in his travels are full of meaning and poetry. Moreover, it will be well if you can learn to understand something of the ways and mind of the people. Mr. Borrow, in his book on "Wild Wales," which is of no particular use as a guide-book, has vividly reproduced much of Welsh life and character. The religious, and even the metaphysical mental character of the people, is very noticeable. It is a pity that no native novelist has done for Wales what has been done so abundantly for Scotland and Ireland. Moreover, the tourist will be fortunate if he has some knowledge of geology, and has worked up some of the books dealing with the subject.

There is nothing like having an object in travelling. People who are ecclesiologically disposed will visit the four Welsh cathedrals. No one can visit these cathedrals without seeing a great deal of North and South Wales. All necessary information about these will be found in Murray's "Handbook" of those cathedrals, and "Essays on Cathedrals." The Popes used to reckon that two pilgrimages to St. David's were equivalent to one pilgrimage to Rome. There is no railway, there is no coach to St. David's. The visitor to Tenby gets to Haverfordwest, and gets on as he can. The cathedral lies in a depressed vale, screened by hills from the Atlantic storms. But you must face that noble sea. When you have climbed St. David's Head you say, "This is like the Logan Rock. This is like the Land's End." Then you turn to the venerable cathedral, and contrast the antiquity with the restorations. All the Welsh cathedrals have within recent years sustained partial or entire restoration. This is a proof of great ecclesiastical vitality under unfavourable conditions. Llandaff is a pre-eminent example. It is not so many years ago since the winds of heaven swept through its empty oriels. It lay unroofed and open to the sky. It has been restored in a style which makes it a model cathedral, the whole space being utilised. Llandaff is practically a suburb of Cardiff. It is to Cardiff what Clifton is to Bristol. It is to my mind exquisitely beautiful where the Taff flows almost beneath the shadow of the cathedral through wooded meadows just before it enters the gorge of hills. The two cathedrals of South Wales really are cathedrals, and are very striking in their way. But the two cathedrals of North Wales are little more than parish churches. A great deal of money has been spent on St. Asaph, with as good result as the old cathedral church could yield. It is, however, more cathedral-like than Bangor, but Bangor has very many attractions, amid which the cathedral is comparatively lost. We are close to the Menai Bridge Railway and the Tubular Bridge, and crossing the Straits by bridge or ferry we have the charming watering-place of Beaumaris. Any one who works up the cathedrals will at the same time be exploring some of the best scenery in Wales.

The last week of August this year drew an extra number of visitants to North Wales on account of the annual meeting of the Archæological Society being held at Llangollen. There is something wonderfully beautiful in this famous vale, and all visitants are told the true story of the "Ladies of Llangollen," and many are those who trace the Dee to its source in Bala Lake, which ought to be visited as the largest sheet of water in Wales. You will often hear Tennyson's lines quoted, how Enid's loving care for Geraint

> Fill'd all the genial courses of his blood
> With deeper, and with ever deeper, love,
> As the south-west that blowing Bala Lake
> Fills all the sacred Dee.

One great sight of the Archæological meeting is that of the reigning Sir Watkin Wynn, returned in better health from abroad. Sir Watkin shares with the Prince of Wales the main honours of the Principality. They say that the meaning of Wynnstay is "Wynn, stay, be satisfied;" but other derivations are also given. And, indeed, the Wynns have every reasons to rest and be thankful, if houses and lands constitute such reasons, as undoubtedly they do in their way. There is a legend about Sir Watkin which some traditions place in a coach, and others on the new railway. I do not know if the story is vero trovato or only ben trovato. The Wynn of the day is always a Watkin—"an Amurath an Amurath succeeds." A tourist entering a carriage at Bala found a gentleman asleep. When he had roused himself, the tourist asked the stranger who owned a fine farm they were passing. As a rule, in North Wales a farm does not mean the same as an English farm. It means an immense stretch of mountain, with, perhaps, a lovely bit of valley interposed. "That farm is mine," said the stranger. They entered a fertile valley. "And who owns the valley?" "I do," was the answer. By and by a big mountain comes in sight. "And who's is the mountain?" "Mine." "And that great house?" "Mine." "And this old castle?" "Mine." The tourist was greatly puzzled. The stranger seemed splendide mendax. The only solution occurred to him, aut Diabolus aut Sir Watkin Wynn. The stranger was Sir Watkin Wynn, and the whole mystery was explained. Wynnstay, it will be remembered, was burnt down some years ago, and many costly treasures of art and antiquity were lost. The cellar, with forty thousand pounds' worth of wines, was saved. The warm-hearted Welsh people, by their subscriptions, gave Lady Wynn a Bible to console her in this trouble. We need hardly say that Wynnstay has risen again refulgent from its ruins.

But however much the tourist may love to linger in the Vale of Llangollen, or such charming watering-places as Rhyl and Llandudno, he should leave the Campanian shore for the strong, rugged heart of the hills. The very raison d'être of a tourist in North Wales is to fling a fly, or climb a mountain. There is no one who cannot walk or go on a mule from Llanberis to Y Wyddfa, the summit of the far-stretching ranges of Snowdon. It is not a bad preparation to read Charles Kingsley's "Two Years Ago," and then his "Letters and Memoirs." He ought to visit Bettws-y-Coed, beloved of artists, and Penygwryd, the headquarters of climbers. And to give one more literary illustration, let me quote a fine passage from the letters of Erskine of Linlathen, to whom Dean Stanley eloquently drew attention a short time ago. "The affections are always new, and, to say the truth, whatever weariness my descriptions of the aforesaid mountains may produce on you, the mountains themselves, and the blue sky into which they push their pointed tops, and the rising sun, and the setting sun, and the shining hosts of heaven, and the lake in whose glossy surface all these reflect themselves, never tire me. Their silence and their simplicity, and their beauty, are never new to me; there is no over-excitement in them."

MR. DIBDIN'S SUCCESSORS

It is something to be thankful for in these times of war and rumours of war that that fine spirit by virtue of which as defenders of England, home, and beauty, we are so justly classed A. 1. by admiring nations is not in danger of dying out or even of sinking low for lack of warrior bards, with tuneful breath to fan the vital flame and witch our men of war on sea as well as shore as did Dibdin of old. It may have seemed that these nightingales of the groves of Mars were at the present crisis slow to warble forth their inspiriting strains, but we should have known had we proper faith in the doctrine that the Hour invariably produces the Man that when the moment of danger really arrived a worthy successor—nay, a good half score—of the immortal writer of "Tom Bowling" and "Poor Jack" would spring to the fore. If any one has any doubt of this let him refer to the musical columns of any daily newspaper; if he does not find sufficient there to dispel his qualms, then let him on any evening of the week look in at one of the fifteen or twenty music-halls to be found within the four mile radius from Charing Cross, and I promise that he shall be satisfied, and more. It is quite amazing how completely the spirit of war has seized on the people. To the exclusion even of such soul-stirring lays as "The Two Obadiahs" and "Don't Wake the Baby" they hail with eager delight any poetic production that bears on the Eastern Question, and reward with rapturous plaudits the singer and composer the ringing hammer of whose genius strike sparks of patriotic fire from the eyes of the sons of Britannia,—nay, the daughters as well, as they clap their hands, stamp their feet, and tingle the sugar crusher against the glass which contains alcoholic stimulant hot and strong.

There is no make-believe about these demonstrations. The penny dailies assure us—according to the side they espouse—that when Russia or Turkey is mentioned the audience rise in a body and hiss—or hurrah—as the case may be. There can be no doubt that the weapon wielded in this way is a very powerful weapon, and it is to be hoped that the giants of song will not abuse the mighty power with which they are invested. The question is whether, at this preliminary stage of the proceedings, it is judicious to put the screw on too powerfully. It is no doubt an excellent thing, should it be needed, to have in hand something that, as regards its effects on the English people, may act as does the unfurling of the Green Flag of the Prophet on the soldiers of the Sultan, but should it not be kept in reserve for an emergency, or if used now should it not be diluted, and rendered less intoxicating? It would be scarcely convenient to find the thousands that flock nightly to our music halls being driven by these potent war-songs to a sort of frenzy, and rushing to the War Office in a body, demanding swords and bayonets to go and fight the Turks or the Russians—according as they have been stirred. There was once a comic writer who killed a man by unguardedly relating to him an excruciatingly good joke, and who resolved never again to be as "funny as he could," and our modern Dibdins might take the hint. They may, perhaps, urge that what's in 'em must come out for their health's sake, and that it is no use in these days of ruthless competition to hide one's light beneath a bushel. Still it must be admitted that though talent has its privileges it should be restrained when it takes such lofty flights as that from which the subjoined is an extract. The author and composer and singer is the Great Colney Hatchington, and it is sung nightly, with ear-splitting applause (see advertisement), and is copyright:—

> Says Nick, the Russian Bear, "By great Peter, I declare,
>   The Turkey Cock to lick, oh all to fits;
> Though, John Bull, you may swear, and Gladstone tear his hair,
>   My game's to chaw up Turkey into bits."
> "But, stop," says old John Bull, "'ere the order out I pull
>   To bid 'em let out loose my dogs of war;
> I've an army none can beat, and a navy all complete,
>   With ironclads a half-a-dozen score."

Spoken: "Yes, that's true, old bristles and tallow! And I'll tell you something else. My army and navy are like what Tom Sayers used to say of his mauleys: 'This one is six months in the 'orsepital, and the other is sudden death.'"

But the mere words, though they may convey an idea of the grandeur of the mind that gave them birth, fall far short of doing justice to the song as sung. The Great Colney Hatchington has already made himself famous in such popular ditties as the "Girl at the Tripe-shop Bar" and the "Downy Catsmeat Cove," and it will be sufficient to say that the force and fire by means of which he made the lyrics in question standard successes, are rather enhanced than curtailed in his rendering of the "Turkey, the Bull, and the Bear." The way in which he hangs his hat on the back of his head, and with both his hands in the pockets of his trowsers, swells out his cheeks and rolls his eyes in imitation of the bragging, blustering Czar, is only excelled by the "knowing" way in which he cocks his hat and winks, and lays his forefinger along his nose, when enacting the part of John Bull delivering his spirited reply, and his happy allusion to Mr. Sayers. It is whispered in certain quarters that the great Colney Hatchington may one day be offered a distinction that was conferred on Charles Dibdin, but it is scarcely likely he would accept it. What temptation is a paltry three hundred a year to a man who already keeps his brougham and pair, and can make thirty pounds a week by singing nightly at three halls?

THE GARDENS OF LES TOUCHES

DURING a recent stay in Touraine I gladly profited by an opportunity afforded me of visiting Les Touches, the delightfully situated property of the well-known and enterprising publisher, M. Alfred Mame. Every lover of handsomely printed and carefully edited works is already familiar with the magnificent productions, especially the beautifully illustrated series of French classics, issuing at frequent intervals from this important house at Tours, one of the most admirably organised establishments of the kind either in France or elsewhere. By his industry and unremitting attention to business, M. Mame has amassed a large fortune, a considerable portion of which is annually set aside for charitable purposes, and for the benefit of the many hundred workmen employed by him; for the latter model farms and lodging houses have been erected, and both in the construction of the dwellings and the cultivation of land every modern improvement has been successively and judiciously introduced.

Les Touches, the favourite residence of its owner, and one of the show-places of the département of Indre et Loire, is situated about six miles from Tours, on a rising slope commanding an extensive view over a wide expanse of country. Adjoining it, but separated by a road from the private grounds, are the picturesque woods, also the property of M. Mame, intersected in all directions by carriage drives for the convenience of the public, and containing the finest horse-chestnut trees I ever saw. The house occupied by the proprietor and his wife is small, and without any particular architectural pretension; but nothing could be better chosen than its position. In front of the terrace, as far as the eye can reach, extends a vast panorama of vineyards and meadowland, here and there dotted with village spires, while on the right the towers of Tours Cathedral are distinctly visible. The pleasure grounds abound in trimly-kept avenues, one of which, called l'Allée de Luynes, embraces a view of the ancient castle of Luynes of historic celebrity, proudly perched on an eminence beyond the Loire, and recalling to the memory more than one tradition connected with the valiant Connétable and the fair but unscrupulous intriguer, Marie de Rohan, Duchesse de Chevreuse. Three pieces of water, spanned by ornamental bridges, and richly stocked with rare and curious specimens, form a pleasing feature in the landscape, and in one of the shady alleys seats resembling in shape gigantic mushrooms are scattered about for the accommodation of visitors. Below, a steam engine is perpetually at work, supplying water from an artesian well for the irrigation of the turf, which thus preserves its verdure in spite of as scorching a sun as I ever remember to have felt.

The flower-beds are laid out with exquisite taste and harmony of design, and present a dazzling brilliancy of artistically variegated hues; but the main attraction of Les Touches consists in its hot-houses, filled with the scarcest tropical plants, and requiring the constant attention of no less than twenty gardeners. M. Mame himself kindly volunteered to be our cicerone during our walk, and pointed out the different objects of interest with all the enthusiasm of a collector; the majority of these rarities, comprising almost every variety of botanical marvels, have been acquired by their possessor at a considerable cost, and in many cases have turned out excellent investments. One plant, for instance, which he mentioned having purchased for seventy-five francs, had so improved under his care that he was lately offered 800 for it by a rival amateur; he also showed us several others, mostly Indian specimens, which only needed a few months' sojourn in his hot-houses to be worth more than double their original value.

The soil in this part of Touraine is light and poor, and although favourable to the culture of the vine, can only in other respects be made productive by infinite labour and incessant watering. These natural difficulties have to a great extent been overcome at Les Touches by the unwearied solicitude of its owner, who personally superintends the management of his estate, and seldom passes a day without planning some new improvement, and witnessing its being carried into execution. Though sixty-five years of age, he is hale and wiry, and endowed with remarkable activity, mental and bodily, devoting whatever time can be spared from his establishment at Tours to the embellishment of one of the most desirable and best cultivated properties in France. It is almost superfluous to add that throughout the département he is deservedly respected and esteemed; and if any Conservative could triumph over the Democratic prejudices of the population as a candidate for the Chamber, no one (did he so will it) ought to have a better chance of success than Monsieur Alfred Mame.

THE READER

THE Asiatic road to India is ever a popular theme, and more particularly so at the present time, when recent events have reawakened amongst a large section of Englishmen the never completely dormant fear of a Russian invasion of our Indian dominions. Such Russophobists, therefore, will welcome "A Ride through Islam," by Captain Hippisley Cunliffe Marsh, F.R.G.S. (Tinsley Brothers), which recounts the journey of the author, a captain in the 18th Bengal Cavalry, through Persia and Afghanistan to India viâ Meshed, Herat, and Kandahar. Unfortunately this journey was undertaken in September, 1872, and as we are now in September, 1877, the intervening five years have probably wrought much change in the districts which Capt. Marsh visited, more particularly when we remember that the annexation of Khiva, the European tour of the Shah, and the struggle between Shere Ali, the ruler of Afghanistan, and his son, Yakoob Khan, the Governor of Herat—all events which have done something to alter the position of affairs—are now matters of long past history. Still, as a straightforward story of a difficult and dangerous journey, which very few Englishmen would care to venture upon, more especially when wholly unprovided with any species of credentials or letter of permission from the British Government, the book possesses an interest of no common order. In one way Captain Marsh was fortunate—he appears to have met with great hospitality throughout, and nowhere more so than at Herat, where Yakoob Khan showed him every possible civility and kindness, and even confided to him his family troubles and the Cabul intrigues which served so much to estrange him from his father. "I know," he remarked, "that the very fact of my speaking to you in your language will be repeated at Cabul, and will be put down to me as hatching some intrigue against my father." Indeed, the chapter on Herat and its brave ruler is one of the most interesting in the book, which, as a whole, we heartily recommend to the perusal of all interested in Indian and trans-Indian matters.

The recent visit of the Grand Sherif of Morocco to this country with his English-born wife gives a special interest to a work to which, though published some months since, we would at this time draw our readers' attention. In "Morocco and the Moors," by Arthur Leared, M.D., F.R.C.P., will be found an immense mass of highly interesting information concerning that country, which, although nearer to us than Turkey or Egypt, is, with the exception perhaps of Tangiers, almost a complete terra incognita to the modern traveller. In a great measure this is doubtless owing to the intense fanaticism of the Moors, as well as to the internal troubles which are constantly taking place, and which effectually prevented the author from obtaining more than the most cursory of glances at the city of Morocco. Notwithstanding that he held a special letter of recommendation from the Grand Sherif, Dr. Leared was unable to stir a step in that town without assuming a disguise, and being attended by a well-armed guard. Even then he would be constantly mobbed by the population, who were quick at penetrating his disguise, until at last he determined to retrace his steps to quarters where the hated "Kaffir" was at liberty to pursue his investigations comparatively unmolested. One of the chief objects the author had in view in visiting the country was to bring into notice the "incomparable climates" to be found in that country for persons suffering from affections of the chest, and certainly there are one or two towns, if we are to judge from his description, whose sites appear to have been specially selected with a view to benefiting consumptive subjects. Of Tangiers, where the foreign representatives reside, there is a fair sprinkling of Europeans, and there need be no fear of fanaticism, he gives a very glowing account, and when we read, in addition to its sanitary advantages, that beef and mutton can be bought for 2d. a pound, a fowl for 9d., and a duck for 1s., while the cost of living at a hotel amounts to only from 4s. to 7s. per diem, we can only express our surprise that Tangiers has not long since become a fashionable sanatorium. Mogador, on the Atlantic coast, Dr. Leared considers even superior as a health resort to Tangiers, although of course its greater distance from Europe and present want of accomodation are considerable drawbacks. Sanitary subjects, however, occupy but a small portion of the work, which abounds in amusingly-told adventures encountered by the author during his journeys in the interior, and with valuable information anent the historical, geographical, and zoological features of the country and descriptions of many curious manners and customs of the Moors and the great Israelite community which forms so large a portion of the population.

Meteorology is fast becoming a popular science, and there are now few households where the inmates do not keep watch upon the barometer and the thermometer with an interest which is heightened by accumulated experience, and by the comparison of notes with similarly disposed neighbours and friends. The want of a really popular treatise on this subject has, therefore, long been felt, although it may not be generally known that Mr. Scott, of the Meteorological Office, has written a capital little work on the use of meteorological instruments which affords considerable information to intending observers. The work before us, however, "Weather Warnings for Watchers," (Houlston and Sons), by the "Clerk" himself, well supplies this want in a really popular and cheap form—all kinds of instruments and their uses are described and illustrated, tables are given by which the "watcher" may astonish his friends by the accuracy of his predictions, together with much valuable instruction which will enable a beginner in "weather wisdom" to qualify himself for a more advanced study of a science which even its proficients admit to be still only in its infancy.

While on scientific periodicals we may mention a capital issue of the Natural Science Series—the "Elements of Physiography," &c., by the Rev. Alexander Mackay, LL.D., F.R.G.S. (William Blackwood and Sons)—a compact manual for schools and students of the elements of physiography and physical geography, including chapters on mathematical geography, the solar system, the atmosphere, climates, electricity and magnetism, biology, geology, and even optical instruments—really a capital multum in parvo for even advanced students.

Three little works on topics of the day are "Who was Caxton?" (Hardwicke and Bogue)—a monograph detailing the chief features of the celebrated father of English printing in his various capacities of merchant, ambassador, historian, author, translator, and printer; and two works on the Colorado Beetle—"The Colorado Potato Beetle," illustrated and described by Dr. Andrew Wilson (W. and A. K. Johnston), and "The Colorado Beetle," by Charles V. Riley, M.A., Ph.D. (George Routledge and Sons). The coloured illustrations portraying the insect in all stages of its career, both in its natural size and highly magnified, render the first-mentioned work particularly valuable.

As a contribution to the already bulky literature of ferns, Mr. F. G. Heath's new volume, entitled "The Fern World" (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.), will by no means be considered superfluous. The author's previous work on the subject, the "Fern Paradise," has made him well known to a large class of readers, who will welcome his more ambitious performance. No one can write a good book on such a subject unless he be an enthusiast, and this evidently Mr. Heath is; while his technical knowledge of the structure, classification, and culture of ferns has rendered his book one which will serve as a standard book of reference for all lovers and cultivators of these beautiful plants. The second part of the book is invaluable to owners or would-be owners of fern rockeries and fern-houses, or even of humble pots, wherewith to brighten their dwelling rooms. "Fern Hunting" and "Some Rambles through Fernland" (Devonshire, of course), which comprise Parts III. and IV., will recall many pleasant recollections to those who have trodden the same ground as Mr. Heath in his search for specimens, while to those who have not they will serve as an excellent guide. The concluding part, which deals with forty-five varieties of ferns best known or most sought for by fern lovers, is most judiciously written, containing all the information generally required. Every fern, too, is figured in the admirable plates which, to the number of twelve, are incorporated with the book; and it is not too much to say that they are the most admirable yet seen in any similar work, being "nature-printed" by the aid of photography, and not mere drawings from nature. These, with the full-page engravings of views in "Fernland," and the beautiful printing and general execution of the volume, make it one of the handsomest drawing-room books of the season.

A pleasant week's bicycle trip is chronicled in a miniature volume, "Bonn to Metz," by C. F. Casella (S. Low and Co.). Bicycles were little known in Germany at the time of the author's ride (April, 1872), and he and his friend with their iron steeds created considerable astonishment throughout their journey. The news of their coming often preceded them to the various towns, and brought out the inhabitants to stare at the strange arrivals. Free from the ordinary tourist worries of catching trains, finding suitable horses, or bargaining with drivers, the author's trip was thoroughly enjoyable, and entailed no further annoyance than a spill and a few wettings. Mr. Casella's bright description will probably tempt other bicyclists to go and do likewise.

HER LITTLE SHOE!

LITTLE Blue Shoe—sad little shoe!
Face that was tender—heart that was true!

Full many and many a year has flown,
  Since into the sunlight she came;
And one there is left and one there is gone,
  The tender, the bright little Dame.
I see her now—with the dancing eyes,
  The sea-shell tint, the glance so sweet.
The fluttering lip and laugh of surprise,
  And the bright blue shoes on the little feet.
Little Blue Shoe! gay little shoe!
Face that was tender, heart that was true!

Full many and many a year has flown
  Since the sunny day in June
When she brightened the house that was now her own:
  Her laugh as gay as a tune.
For now up the stair, and down the stair,
  And busily through the street,
Fluttered so fast in matronly care,
  The little blue shoes and restless feet.
Little Blue Shoe! bright little shoe,
Face that was tender, heart that was true!

And many and many a year has flown,
  Each bringing a colder chill;
And one there is left, and one there is gone—
  The little feet are still.
All in the days of November gloom
  The house I am wandering through,
And I find in a lonely, forgotten room,
  Lost in a corner, her little shoe!
Little Blue Shoe! sad little shoe!
Face that was tender, heart that was true!

WINDSOR CASTLE.—Until the return of the Court from Scotland in November the State apartments will be open to the public on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays between the hours of eleven and four. Free tickets of admission are issued at the office of the Royal Windsor Guide, Castle Hill. The Albert Memorial Chapel is open every Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday from twelve to three. Tickets are not required.

THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON STATE MEDICINE of the British Medical and Social Science Association have recently published their memorial to the Earl of Beaconsfield. They begin by reminding Lord Beaconsfield that in 1868 a Royal Commission was appointed at their request to inquire into the administration and operation of the sanitary laws, and that the Royal Commission, as the result of the evidence then collected, recommended a consolidation of the law relating to the public health and other changes in sanitary administration, several of which have been adopted and made law by the Public Health Act of 1875. Subsequently, in 1876, a Sanitary Conference of representative local governing bodies was held under the presidency of Lord Aberdare to consider how, in any change of the existing system, greater efficiency of action could be best obtained. The Committee point out the difficulties that have arisen owing to the distinctions which exist in the powers and obligations vested in rural and urban sanitary authorities, and suggest as a remedy for these evils the establishment of County Boards for administration and finance, and state that there would be no difficulty in obtaining the services of good men to act as consultants to this Board, and to superintend the sanitary work of the whole or part of a county. Under these officers are to be district medical officers of health, while the county officers are to be under the direction of a chief attached to the central authority,—the whole staff thus constituted being presided over by a Minister of Health. The Committee are of opinion that officers of health should not be permitted to practice, and that they would therefore be in a position to obtain from medical practitioners the evidence necessary for the performance of their duties. We regret that Lord Beaconsfield has been prevented by press of public work from receiving this deputation, and would remind his Lordship that matters concerning the health of the community are the duty of a statesman who came into office with the cry of "Sanitas sanitatum, omnia sanitas."

YOUR OWN ARTIST'S HORSE UNDER FIRE

DINNER TIME

THE sound of the dinner-bell is everywhere a welcome sound, and it is especially welcome when the daily round of existence is of an unvaried and monotonous character. It reverberates pleasantly in the ears of the factory-hand, weary with the eternal hum of machinery; it rejoices the heart of the passenger on board an ocean steamer, albeit he has but recently disposed of a hearty breakfast and two luncheons; and as, in spite of their seclusion from the world, monks still retain a large amount of human nature in their composition, we may justly presume that the efforts of the worthy brother who has "set the bell a-ringing" are fully appreciated by his comrades. As they troop in, the various dispositions indicated by their faces form an interesting study. The features of the veteran with his hands clasped indicate a placid benevolence, while his interlocutor is evidently of a more restless temperament. Behind him stands one who, to judge from his ascetic countenance, regards dinner rather as a necessity to be endured than as a luxury to be enjoyed. This doctrine is certainly not held by the jovial brother, whose hand gently presses that part of his person which is destined apparently to expand under the genial influence of dinner. Mr. Topham has judiciously occupied the background of his picture with a very artistic fountain, at which the brothers perform their somewhat scanty ablutions, soap being a substance which is but lightly esteemed in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean.

LIFE IN MANITOBA, IV.

THESE sketches, together with those which we have published in previous issues, afford a vivid representation of the sort of life which is led in those parts of North America which were formerly under the sway of the Hudson's Bay Company, and where, although the latitude is only that of Southern England and Northern France, the climate is almost Arctic in its severity. The dog plays a far more important part in these regions than in temperate countries; he supplies the place of the railway locomotive and the omnibus horse, and so he figures in every sketch. In the first, he is shown resting after his labours, quietly contemplating the glow of the fire, or holding an animated conference with a companion, while his two-legged masters are hard at work getting their camp ready, one emptying his snow-shoes, another felling a tree, and another cooking. In the next engraving the effects of uphill and downhill travelling are contrasted. In one the driver has to hang back to retard the rapidity of the descent; in the other he has to lighten the labours of the dogs by helping to drag their load. In the last sketch the team is kept waiting by one refractory steed who refuses to be harnessed, but will probably be compelled to yield to force majeure.—Our engravings are from sketches by Mr. H. Bullock Webster.

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The interest of the campaign has this week been transferred from the Balkans to the Danube, and the Russians have at length resumed active operations round Plevna. Exhausted by his fruitless conflict in the Shipka Pass, Suleiman Pasha has subsided into quietude, and Mehemet Ali and Osman Pasha have taken up the struggle. In the engagements of the past fortnight the Turks have certainly shown their powers of fighting well and steadily in the open field. Thus on Thursday week Mehemet Ali attacked part of the Cesarewitch's army under General Leonoff at Karahassankoi, on the western bank of the Lom, and, after twelve hours' hard fighting, during which the village changed hands six times, drove the enemy across the river, and forced them to evacuate Haidarkoi and to fall back on Gabovo. The Russian force only numbered 3,500 men, while the Turks mustered 12,000. Next morning the Russians retreated to Popkoi, and as a strong Turkish force had concentrated on the road between Gabovo and Popkoi, the latter village was burnt and evacuated on Saturday, being subsequently occupied by the Turks. Meanwhile a detachment from Rustchuk on Friday seized Kadikoi, and was subsequently expelled by some Russian reinforcements, but on Tuesday the garrison again made a sortie, and, according to Turkish sources, defeated the Russians. By the victory of Karahassankoi the Turks are masters of the tract between the two branches of the Lom, while should the advance of the Rustchuk garrison prove successful the Russian bridge at Pyrgos will be seriously endangered, and the Turkish lines brought unpleasantly near to Sistova.

Following up the movements of his colleague, Osman Pasha on Friday advanced on the villages of Pelisat and Zgalince, about five miles from Poredin, where he captured the Russian redoubt, only to be driven out with considerable loss. Some slight advantage must have been gained by the Turks, however, as the Russians are said to have been unable to recover their forepost line. Osman's advance was soon checked, for on Tuesday Gens. Skobeleff and Meretinsky captured Loftcha, which had been seized by the Turks soon after the Plevna affair, and which, as it commands the line of retreat to Sofia, is a most important position. Skobeleff had been before Loftcha for a fortnight, and the permission to attack was probably given in consequence of the fear lest Suleiman should steal round and unite with Osman Pasha, small parties of his army having been seen in the neighbourhood. Reports are also current of a battle before Plevna on Wednesday. The Russians have thus at last abandoned their waiting tactics, and Osman Pasha is now also threatened by 40,000 Roumanian troops who have crossed the Danube, and are to be stationed at Poredin, leaving the Grand Duke free to act on the south of Plevna. Prince Charles has been appointed Commander of the "United Russo-Roumanian Army," with Gen. Zatoff as chief of his staff, and General Cerner as head of the Roumanian detachment, and has issued an order of the day. Great discontent is expressed in Roumania at the departure of the soldiers, who were intended to defend their homes and not to serve the purpose of Russia. The Roumanians also are in dread of a Turkish invasion, as a bridge has been made to an island opposite Kalarash, from whence the Turks can advance from Silistria. The Grand Duke Nicholas is still patiently awaiting his reinforcements, which come up very slowly, no fresh troops having arrived until the middle of last month. This delay is all the more serious as the season is advancing, and the climate of the Lower Danube does not favour an autumn campaign. The river has remained open all the winter only eight times out of thirty-seven years, and the ice is generally so thick as to imperil the strongest vessels. The pontoon bridges at Simnitza must be taken up for the winter, and the difficulty of communication will thus be very great.

In the Shipka Pass the continuous fighting has relapsed into occasional reconnaissances, the most important being on Monday at Yechilagatch. The Russians hold their ground, and Suleiman's movements are shrouded in some mystery, it not being clearly known whether he is reorganising his shattered troops or whether he is moving round by another pass to join the forces on the Danube. General Radetzky has been presented by the Czar with a sword set with diamonds for his gallant defence of the Pass, and has been strongly reinforced. Official Russian sources fix the number of killed and wounded at 4,200, while the Turks estimate their own loss at 7,000. The operations in ASIA have been unimportant, consisting of numerous minor engagements. The Grand Duke Michael has assumed the command of the army, vice General Loris Melikoff, and the Russian camp has been advanced from Kuruk Dara to the Karajal hills, while the Turks are reported to be moving towards Alexandropol. Soukhoum Kaleh was definitively abandoned by the Turks on Saturday, after repeated skirmishes, and the Abkhasian insurrection has thus been successfully repressed.

CONSTANTINOPLE is busy succouring the refugees, who are pouring in by thousands. The Sultan has given up his palace of Beglerbeg for their use, and many have been received into private houses. Parliament meets on November 1st., and the financial estimates for 1877—8, have been published, showing a large deficit. Abdul Kerim, Redif Pasha, and several other ex-officials, have been sent temporarily to the island of Lemnos, their trial being deferred till a more leisure season. ST. PETERSBURG is delighted with Germany for protesting against the Turkish cruelties, and equally disgusted with England for not taking the initiative. The money difficulties in Russia are growing worse, and people are beginning to assert that had they known six months ago as much as they know now they would never have gone to war. Blame of their generals is pretty freely expressed, and has fallen heavily upon Baron Krüdener, who has implored the various correspondents to publish that he attacked Plevna against his wish, and under the strict orders of the Grand Duke.

SERVIA has as yet taken no active part, and her delay is credited to the remonstrances of the German and English Representatives. Nevertheless, war preparations continue, the Skuptschina is said to be convoked for the 11th inst., the plan of campaign has been decided, and all officers are to rejoin by the 13th inst. It is asserted that in the event of a Servian defeat the Czar has offered Prince Milan a home at St. Petersburg, general's rank in the service, and social precedence immediately after the Grand Dukes. In MONTENEGRO it is reported that the bulk of the army have abandoned the siege of Nicksics, and are marching on the Duga Pass and on Drobniak. AUSTRIA continues to look on calmly, and the Magyar party are highly indignant with the Government for joining in the German protest.

FRANCE.——The sudden death of M. Thiers at St. Germain has been a shock to the whole of France, and party differences have been merged in the general regret for the "Libérateur de la Territoire." M. Thiers fairly died in harness. He was in good health to the last, was at work on his electoral manifesto, and was to have gone to Paris in the afternoon to meet some of his friends, M. Gambetta amongst the number. On returning from his walk on Monday morning, however, M. Thiers complained of a chill, grew worse after breakfast, and then sank into a condition of coma, from which he never recovered. The cold weather at St. Germain is said to have hastened his end, which, in spite of his eighty years, was totally unexpected, the only bad symptoms of late having been restlessness and drowsiness. On the previous day he had been discussing the merits of Delacroix with M. Meissonier, who was engaged on his portrait, while only a short time ago, when reports of his death were current, and some Boursiers besieged his house to learn the truth, he bade his secretary tell them that "Petit bonhomme vit encore." Marshal MacMahon, then at the Loire manœuvres, at once telegraphed his intended return to Paris, and requested that a State funeral should be held at the Invalides, as it "must be a national demonstration, and not one of a party." The ex-President will afterwards be buried in Père La Chaise. The body was brought back to Paris on Wednesday, when it lay in State in the Place St. Georges, until the funeral, which was to take place to-day (Saturday), and will be a most imposing ceremony, as full military honours will be paid to the late statesman, in consequence of his eminent services. The Minister of the Interior has issued an official eulogium of M. Thiers, and the members of the Left have published a manifesto. The importance of this loss to the Republican party at the present moment can scarcely be over estimated. Many timid Liberals who rallied to M. Thiers' prudent Republic will fight shy of M. Gambetta, notwithstanding his recent moderation, although the latter is doing his best to prevent this feeling, as he is reported to have put forward M. Grévy as the head of the Republicans, while his journal, the République Française, earnestly advocates the maintenance of M. Thiers' plans and spirit. The Press is almost unanimous in praise of the ex-President, the Government organs being nearly as laudatory as the Republican sheets, and only a few ultra-Bonapartist and Legitimist journals have the bad taste to sneer at the dead. In Paris the topic has absorbed all others, and crowds have visited the Place St. Georges. M. Thiers has left two wills, one relating to his fortune, which is bequeathed to his wife and sister-in-law, and the other, a political testament, in the keeping of M. Barthélémy St. Hilaire, his faithful friend.

M. Gambetta's trial has, of course, been thrown into the shade. He was examined by the Juge d'Instruction on Friday, when he assumed the responsibility of publishing the Lille speech, although he denied the accusation of libelling the Marshal and insulting his Ministers. He received a hearty ovation from the crowd outside the Palais de Justice. The trial has been fixed for next Tuesday, and the summons was served on M. Gambetta on Wednesday. Much discussion is going on as to the suppression of the reports of the trial—a measure vigorously advocated by M. de Broglie's Français, which points out that this step is legal according to a Republican statute of 1849—while the Débats declares that if M. Gambetta were condemned to lose his civil rights the Chamber would be justified in validating his election.

The elections are to be fixed for the 14th prox.—a date twenty days beyond the legal limit of three months after the dissolution, and the Marshal is expected to issue a manifesto on the eve of the voting. M. Paul de Cassagnac has been speechifying in the Gers, when he besought Imperialists and Royalists to forget their opinions and unite at the ballot-box. Marshal MacMahon's tour came to an untimely end by the death of M. Thiers. He went to La Forêt for the opening of the shooting, and on Monday started for the Loire manœuvres, whence he returned to Paris instead of going on to Bordeaux. He leaves again for the South on Sunday.

In Paris the Marshal has received the new American Minister, General Noyes, and has bidden farewell to Mr. Washburne.—The Parisians have been laughing at a caricature in the Eclair of M. Gambetta holding his sides at the idea of his prosecution, which was speedily confiscated by the police, in company with a pile of ribbons worked with the portraits of MM. Thiers and Gambetta.—There have been two first representations—a comedy, Pierre, by MM. Cormon and Beauplan, at the Vaudeville, and Chanteuse par Amour, a charming monologue for Madame Judic, at the Variétés.—A serious railway collision occurred to the Boulogne train on Saturday night at Noyelles, when nine persons, several of whom were English, were badly hurt.

GERMANY.——The anniversary of Sedan was kept at Berlin on Sunday with great rejoicings, and a monument to Carl Wilhelm, the composer of the "Wacht am Rhein," was unveiled at his native town, Crefeld; but the Germans are anxious to assure France that the celebration was in memory of their national unity, not of their neighbour's defeat. Indeed, their sentiments towards France are very friendly just now, and much regret is felt for M. Thiers, who was sincerely admired by Prince Bismarck. The result of the elections is also looked for with considerable anxiety.—Emperor William was to visit Herr Krupp at Essen on Monday, and on Wednesday would receive, at Castle Benrath, a deputation from the Protestant clergy.—The Imperial Prince has been superintending the military manœuvres in Bavaria, where he was warmly received, while King Louis sulked in his Alpine castle. During the coming manœuvres at Metz a sham siege will be undertaken.—The Colorado Beetle has been successfully eradicated from Mulheim.

UNITED STATES.——Brigham Young, the Mormon "Prophet," died last week at Salt Lake City, at the age of seventy-six, having been head of the Mormon Church since the death of Joseph Smith in 1844. His death will probably contribute to the downfall of Mormonism, already tottering, and no successor is likely to be chosen just at present, although his son, John Young, is put forward for the office. Meanwhile the government of the Church is carried on by twelve apostles.

The state of trade in America is reported to be rapidly improving. Railway traffic is on the increase, the exports are favourable, and the mills in full work, while the only depression is in the iron trade. The Working Men's Party, though only of recent formation, is becoming a formidable movement, and will warmly contest the election of the State officers in Ohio in November.—Three serious accidents are reported this week. In New York a piano factory has been burnt down with a loss of some fifty lives, and has inflicted damage to the value of 200,000*l*., forty other houses being injured; an incendiary fire has occurred at Paris, in Texas, when there was considerable loss of life; and a train on the Rock Island Railway fell into a river near Desmoines, the bridge having been washed away in a storm. Twenty persons were killed and forty injured.—The Indian Chief, Sitting Bull, is said to have re-entered the States and joined the Nez Percés, and 700 troops have accordingly been sent to the Upper Missouri.

INDIA.——Little change in the Famine reports. Distress and mortality continue to increase in Mysore and Madras, affairs are critical in the North-West Provinces, and scarcity is imminent in Rajpootana, but in Bombay the prospects are slightly bettered by the rain. The Viceroy is still in Madras, and has requested that no subscriptions may be organised until the Government has decided on a regular system of relief, as difficulties might otherwise arise. It is suggested, however, that private charity might care for orphans, and establish relief camps.—There has been a small difficulty on the Punjab frontier with the Jowakis—a branch of the Afridis—who had made a raid on British territory, but the disturbance has been suppressed.—Affairs are very unsettled in Cabul, and the death of Yakoob Khan of Kashgar is confirmed. His eldest son was also killed, and Hakim Tomb, the son of the deposed ruler of Yarkand, has been recognised as Ameer.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In ITALY the Pope has dismissed his physician, Dr. Pellegallo, in consequence of reports having leaked out of His Holiness's bad health.—SWEDEN is celebrating the quatercentenary of the University of Upsala.—In EGYPT the Nile is still below the minimum height for the last eight years, and is now falling.—The CAPE Parliament has been prorogued, and Sir Bartle Frere in the closing speech said that the annexation of the Transvaal had been welcomed by a great majority.—In AUSTRALIA the Chinese question grows more serious, the Bill of the Queensland Legislature taxing each Chinese immigrant 10*l.* has been sanctioned by Lord Carnarvon, but the proposed miner's right of 3*l.* per annum on each Celestial gold-digger is not yet decided. The nuisance is little felt in other Colonies, where the Chinese are few and only take up despised work, but the Queensland goldfields are literally overrun. The fortifications of Sydney and Newcastle are being actively considered, and it is proposed to build an ironclad to cruise round the coast.

THE COURT

The Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold have been taking their usual walks and drives in the Highlands this week, and there is little to chronicle beyond that on Sunday Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold were present at Divine Service at the parish church of Crathie, attended by the Duchess of Roxburghe and Viscount Bridport, the Rev. A. Campbell officiating, and that Mr. Hardy, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Forbes of Newe, and Lieut.-Colonel Farquharson dined with Her Majesty on Tuesday.

The Prince of Wales has gone to Trouville. The Princess remains at Cowes with her children, the health of young Prince Albert Victor now improving daily. It is authoritatively contradicted that the Princess of Wales intends to pay a lengthened visit to Denmark.—Prince and Princess Christian have been staying at Jervaux Abbey with the Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury, and have visited the Marquis and Marchioness of Ripon.—The Duke of Cambridge has had a severe attack of gout at Homburg, but has now recovered.—It is stated that the Duke of Edinburgh's visit to Athens was curtailed by a telegram from the Home Government requesting him to leave immediately, as his presence there might be misconstrued at the present time.

CHURCH NEWS

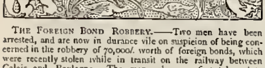
THE "PROTESTANT" CHURCH.——Mr. William Grant, of Peckham, has written to the Bishop of Rochester with reference to his lordship's late sermon at Hatcham, in which he stated that "if the Church of England was not a Protestant Reformed Church she was a shameful schism, and ought not to have an existence." Mr. Grant says that as an English Churchman he has been required all his life to profess his faith in "the Catholic Church," but has never been required to profess himself a "Protestant," nor to acknowledge himself a member of a "Protestant Church." He asks the Bishop to give him some authority for his being, as an English Churchman, a Protestant, and "that the Church of England in any official Church document calls herself a 'Protestant Reformed Church.'" The Bishop replies, expressing his regret at having pained his correspondent by the use of the word "Protestant," but declares that it was chosen deliberately, and that he inflexibly abides by it. His lordship points out that it would be as reasonable to object to the doctrine of the Trinity because the word does not occur in Scripture as to deny that the Church is Protestant merely because that term is not to be found in the authorised formularies. "Of the Thirty-nine Articles no less than seventeen are directly or indirectly in controversy with Roman error; and so long as the clergy and laity of the Church of England accept the substance of our Articles just so long do they protest against the errors they expose." Mr. Grant in a second letter agrees that the Church of England is a "Reformed" Church, but contends that since the Council of Trent the Catholic and Roman Church may also be so termed. He also admits that the English Church protests against the errors of Rome, but not more than against those of the Anabaptists; and, further, urges that Dr. Thorold's idea of the term, Protestant would probably mean protest against doctrines which are held in common by the Eastern and Roman communions, and which, he asserts are also held by the Anglican Church. To this second letter the Bishop merely replies that he has not time for further discussion of the matter.

THE BURIALS QUESTION.——Canon Ridley's recent letter telling the clergy that they have been hopelessly beaten in the House of Lords, and advising them gracefully to accept the inevitable, has been followed by quite a number of declarations of a similar character. The Ven. Sir S. L. Stamer, Archdeacon of Stoke-on-Trent, in his Visitation Charge delivered last week says that he is unable to see any logical connection between the admission of Dissenters to the churchyards and their admission to the church, which is what so many declare must follow. Nor does he believe that Disestablishment would be one day nearer for the concession.

The Rev. H. C. Calverley, Rector of Bassingham, in a letter to the Daily News, takes the same view, and specially deprecates the demand for a discretionary power of reading the Burial Service—a relief which he thinks might prove a heavier burden to their conscience than the grievance which they now feel.

"A London Clergyman," writing to The Times, denies the dictum of the Attorney-General that there is anything in the Public Worship Act affecting the incumbent of a parish in respect to the churchyard, and urges that the clergy should endeavour to solve the difficulty without the aid of the law, and should also refrain from asking for the freedom of action as to interments which Canon Ridley and others desire. The Times has a leading article founded upon this letter, in which it says that the suggested freedom of the choice as to the reading of the burial service by the clergy would create a greater evil than it would remedy. The Nonconformist anticipates that as the autumnal Diocesan Conferences come on we shall have expressions of opinion on the other side, but thinks it evident that the "no surrender" party will be less confident than usual; and considers it a good sign that the first public expression of opinion since the rising of Parliament should have come from clergymen who see the uselessness of further resistance, and are anxious to put an end in the best way to a long-standing and bitter controversy.

VARIOUS.——The opening service of the Festival of the Three Choirs on Tuesday in Gloucester Cathedral was attended in State by the Corporations of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford. There was a large congregation, and the stewards were very active in preventing any confusion or breach of decorum. A notice on the walls called upon all persons to "observe the reverence due to the House of God." Bishop Ellicott preached the sermon, remarking that the reason of his presence was the grave fact that the permanent interests of the charity for the relief of the widow and orphans of the clergy, in whose behalf the Festival was established, were in some degree endangered. The service was followed by a luncheon in the Corn Exchange, and the Festival itself commenced with the performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah in the Cathedral, where on Wednesday Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music and Beethoven's Engedi (the Mount of Olives) were performed.—A rather noisy meeting was held last week in Southwark to protest against the Ritualistic practices and preaching of the Rev. G. W. Berkeley, the new Vicar of All Hallows, St. Saviour's. An address to the Bishop of Rochester was adopted, asking his lordship to remove "this Romanist" from the district.—On Sunday last the chapel of the Latter Day Saints in Birmingham was draped in black, and the services were of a mournful description. The speakers deplored the death of Brigham Young, and unanimously declared him to be a slandered man. Polygamy was stated to be a hindrance to the spread of the faith, and the rather superfluous announcement was made that so long as one Mormon lived "the Church" would never die.—The Rev. H. S. Syers of Peterborough informs us that the statement made in our issue of the 11th ult., referring to a "Raffle for Bibles," was erroneous, the event having taken place, not in the parish church, of which he is vicar, but in the church of St. Ives.



LEGAL

THE FOREIGN BOND ROBBERY.——Two men have been arrested, and are now in durance vile on suspicion of being concerned in the robbery of 70,000*l.* worth of foreign bonds, which were recently stolen while in transit on the railway between Calais and Boulogne. The man, who was first taken into custody, is a Frenchman, who seems to have attempted to negotiate two Russian Bonds of the respective value of 100*l.* and 50*l.*, which formed part of the stolen property. He, however, denies all knowledge of the robbery. The other prisoner, who gives the name of Carr, was apprehended on Tuesday by a detective, who led him into a trap by offering to purchase some Peruvian bonds which he had for sale. They met in the Euston Road, an introduction being effected by a third person, who afterwards mysteriously vanished from the scene. After some cautious talk as to whether the detective was a "square" man, the two adjourned to the Great Northern Hotel, where, after the door had been locked and bolted, the bonds were produced, and the officer, declaring himself, told Carr to consider himself his prisoner. Tableau! The case stood for next hearing yesterday (Friday).

THE ACCUSED DETECTIVES.——Another three days' wearisome talk has been got through, and yet another remand ordered. On Thursday last week Mr. Williams occupied nearly the whole day in cross-examining the witness Benson, whose retorts on the learned counsel were often received with laughter and applause by the crowd in court. Mr. Williams got a rebuke from Sir James Ingham for telling the witness that "his impudence was equal to his villainy." Mr. Besley and Mr. Wontner put a few questions to him, and on Friday Mr. Lewis followed on behalf of Froggatt, the immediate result of his cross-examination being that his client's bail was altered from two sureties of 250*l.* each to one of 500*l.* Three other of the convicts—Bale, Frederick Kurr, and Murray—were called after Benson left the witness-box; and on Saturday Murray's examination was completed, he was succeeded by Stenning, who is undergoing twelve months' imprisonment for his attempt to rescue the convict Kurr. His statements applied chiefly to the case as against Mr. Froggatt, who during the day was allowed by Sir James Ingham to leave the dock and sit beside his legal advisers at the solicitor's table. The hearing was resumed on Thursday.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——The married members of the City Police, who have for some months been complaining of the hardship of being compelled to live within the City have at last obtained permission to reside anywhere with a mile radius of the City boundaries.—Two Glasgow constables have been placed under arrest on the charge of causing the death of a man by pushing him down a flight of stairs.—An extraordinary duel is reported to have taken place last Sunday night on some housetops at Hull between a German immigrant named Lowan and one of the local police. It seems that Lowan got upon the roof of the house in which he lodged in order to look about him, and when the constable challenged him to come down he mistook him for a thief and fired at him with a revolver. The officer, nothing daunted, made his way to the roof of the adjoining house and pelted the German with bricks and chimneypots until he was glad to surrender. Five shots were fired from the revolver, but it is singular that although three of these struck the policeman's belt the wearer escaped uninjured.—Now that the Detective Force is in such bad odour it is rather surprising that any one not belonging to it should desire to pass as a member. This, however, was the case last week with one William Jones, who called at a shop kept by a Jewish lady to inquire about a stolen watch worth 85*l.*, and declaring that he was an officer from Scotland Yard offered 15*l.* if she delivered it up, otherwise he must search her premises. He had, however, reckoned without his host, for he soon found himself in the hands of a real policeman, and has since been fined 10*l.* or two months' imprisonment for his false assumption of the character.—A constable of the X Division stationed at Hanwell is now in custody at Brentford charged with having committed a burglary at a public-house. He seems to have been taken almost red-handed by the police-sergeant on the beat, and at his house a large quantity of stolen property was discovered, besides pawnbrokers' duplicates, skeleton keys, and a number of unused railway tickets.—The Maidstone magistrates do not apparently see their way to acting on the excellent instructions recently issued by Mr. Cross with regard to Italian vagrants. Two men and three children were the other day taken before them, and though 25*l.* was found upon the elder prisoner, they were dismissed with a caution only, the bench being of opinion that a conviction under the Vagrancy Act would not stand. We are glad to see that the case is to be reported to the Home Office, whence probably more precise instructions will now issue.—An odd instance of mistaken identity occurred last week at Grantchester, near Cambridge. An inquest was held upon a body supposed to be that of James Dazeley, which was found drowned; but two witnesses identified the body as that of John Adams, of Chesterton, and the jury so returned. Subsequent inquiry, however, proved that both Dazeley and Adams were still alive, and the question as to the identity of the dead man remains a mystery.—"Castor Oil Pills" it appears are not always made of castor oil, the term being applied indifferently to any "harmless aperient." A Staffordshire grocer has, however, been fined for this misuse of language, and it certainly is as well that people who pay for any particular medicine should not be surreptitiously supplied with another.—Some soldiers of the Coldstream Guards and the 10th Regiment, stationed at Brentwood, have been indulging in a series of street skirmishes on their own account during the last few days. The quarrel originated in an encounter between two men, one from each regiment, in a music hall, on Friday last. Several arrests have been made and some of the injured men are in the hospital.—One of the garrison military policemen at Woolwich has been arrested on a charge of committing a murderous assault upon a young woman as she was crossing the Common.—A dresser employed at the Princess's Theatre was the other day taken before the magistrate on the singular charge of having stolen some fragments of soap, value eightpence. The defence was that such things were rightful perquisites, and the accused was liberated on bail pending a remand.

THE HADJILIK, OR PILGRIMAGE TO MECCA

"PERFORM the pilgrimage to Mecca!" is one of the solemn commands of Mohammed in the Koran, and its observance is held to be binding on all the millions of the human race who practice the faith of Islam. The great object sought in making the pilgrimage is to "ask pardon of God" in the "first house appointed unto men to worship in," where Abraham and Mohammed received revelations from heaven, and where "whoever entereth therein" shall, for this life, and for that which is about to come, "be safe." In issuing this paramount injunction Mohammed appears to have been governed by political and commercial motives, in combination with those of a religious nature. He was evidently desirous of making Mecca a central point of union in which all Mohammedans might congregate for the subjugation of the world, and for the acquisition of its material wealth.

Mecca, the seat of the Mohammedan theocracy, is a Turkish city on the western coast of Arabia, about halfway down the Red Sea, from which it is reached through the port of Jeddah. It is venerated as the spot on which Abraham and Ishmael are said to have erected the "Caaba," or the "First House of God," and which Mohammed adopted as the Temple of all True Believers. The Great Court of the Temple is a large open area in the midst of the city, surrounded by piazzas, enclosed by massive walls, adorned by lofty minarets, and approached by nineteen sacred gates. In the centre stands the "Beit Allah," the Holy of Holies, covered with rich black damask, embroidered with gold, formerly presented new every year by the Khalifs, afterwards by the Sultans of Egypt, and now by the Sultan of Turkey. After the "Caaba," the chief objects of religious regard are the "Stones of Abraham," on which he is recorded to have stood during the building of the "Caabo," and on one of which his footprints are stated to be still visible. Others within the sacred precincts are the "Well of Hagar" and the "Tombs of Ishmael and Hagar." In the neighbourhood of the city are Mount Saffâ and Mount Merwâ, between which Hagar and her son are supposed to have suffered want of water; the Valley of Mina, in which Abraham's faith overcame temptation; and Mount Arafat, where, according to Arabic tradition, Adam repented of his transgression.

Memorials of this character are held to be of such infinite value, that visits to them are not only regarded as acts of filial reverence, but as certain means for obtaining, as declared in the Koran, "visitation of God." Hence every Mussulman longs for the beatific visions which Mecca is believed by him to afford. "See Damascus, the beautiful," cried Mohammed, "and die!" "See Mecca, the heavenly," he cries again, "and live: for it is the 'Gate of Paradise!'" In fulfilment of this mandate, multitudes of devotees from all the more southern regions of the Old World seek, every year, the promised blessings of Mecca, and multitudes perish from the hardship of the ways that lead to them.

The great routes by which the pilgrims reach Mecca are by land or sea, or by a combination of both.

The Egyptian route is from Cairo, on the track taken by the ancient Israelites, across the Desert to Suez, and from thence across the "great and terrible wilderness" of North Arabia to Akaba, at the head of the eastern branch of the Red Sea. Striking southward, it proceeds through the desolate and dangerous regions of West Arabia, until at length, after a journey of 1,000 miles, the sight of Mecca, "the inviolable," gives to the pilgrims hope of rest and safety. The trials to which "faith" is exposed on the journey are almost beyond endurance. Fatigue kills many. Thirst destroys many more. Ablution and cleanliness are impracticable. The caravan as it toils its slow length along, scorched by the sun, suffocated by the dust, and followed by the famished vulture, is a moving miasma. But the caravan, while it parts with its living load, gets richer as it goes. The treasures of the dead pilgrims swell the money bags and distend the wallets of survivors to an extent which enables the stronger members of the diminished host to devote larger funds to the service of alms, feasts, and sacrifices in Mecca, than would, in weaker hands, have been regarded as prudent or possible.

The Syrian route is from Damascus, running in its course along the range of mountains which forms the eastern side of the valley of the Jordan, and passing through the old countries of Moab, Ammon, and Midian.

Leaving the trans-Jordanic regions, it traverses Arabia Provincia, and the great central Desert of Arabia, proceeding to Dar Ayyah, and thence, after a journey of nearly 1,500 miles, to Mecca. This extraordinary journey, which, for the greater part, passes between sterile mountain ranges and over immense sandy wastes, is not less perilous or less fatal in character than that which sadly distinguishes the Egyptian route. The sufferings and mortality of the pilgrims exceed in degree those of the average calamities of war, and are only to be matched in the records of famine and pestilence. The wearied caravan arrives at Mecca despoiled of much of its living freight; and, of the victims who have survived, numbers, weakened by disease, fail to obtain strength for the due observance of the exhausting ceremonies of the holy festival, which consist in rapid marches round the Caaba, runnings between Safâ and Merwâ, throwing stones at evil spirits, ascents of Mount Arafat, and tumultuous sacrifices of sheep, goats, kine, or camels in the valley of Mina.

The principal marine routes are those followed in the voyages from the North African ports of Morocco, Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli to Egypt; the voyages from Constantinople, the ports of Turkey; and the voyages from India, Persia, and the East Coast of Africa. The passages by these routes, being mostly undertaken in sailing vessels, ill-appointed and of small capacity, are tedious, dangerous, and in all respects most unsatisfactory.

To remedy the evils which at present attend the pilgrimage to Mecca, and to promote the good which it is capable of effecting, are not only humane objects, but they are of much commercial value and importance. The saving of human life is the first instinct of civilisation, and the promotion of its well-being is successfully sought through the instrumentality of commercial intercourse. The pilgrims trade as they travel. Mohammed says to them, "It shall be no crime in you to seek an income by trading during your pilgrimage." It is true that comparatively little trade is done, but to the amount effected it is of considerable importance, leading as it does to an extension of the community of nations, and to a profitable exchange of their respective products.

The solution of the difficulties which beset the pilgrimage will be found in an abolition of the great land routes, and in the main a restriction of the passage to marine transit. The completion of the Suez Canal renders the "solution" easy by uniting the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, and giving for the first time to the vast "midland" populations of the Mohammedan countries a ready, healthful, and economic approach to Mecca.

It is ascertained that out of about one million or more who annually contemplate making the pilgrimage to Mecca, but half of whom are deterred from attempting it by the perils of the journey, about 300,000 are prepared to accept the advantages of a direct sea route. The number of pilgrims who visit Mecca annually is estimated at not less than 150,000 to 180,000. The day of the "Courban Bairam," or Great Feast, on which the pilgrims must be present in Mecca, is the ninth of Dhul'hajja, which corresponds with our 14th of December; and as it falls this year on Friday, the Mohammedan Sabbath, the coincidence is regarded as an omen of so much good that the approaching assemblage is expected to be one of great magnitude and splendour.

On reaching the Meccan coast the pilgrims will disembark either at Jambo, or at the flourishing town of Jeddah, the port of Mecca. Jeddah is also the principal port of both sides of the Red Sea. Besides the extra steamers which touch at it during the pilgrimage-to-Mecca season, the steamers of the British India, the Austrian Lloyd's, the Russia (Odessa), the Turkish "Azizie," and the Egyptian "Khédivie" companies call regularly at Jeddah. The towns of Suakim, Hodeida, Mocha, and Massowah (for Abyssinia), as well as the caravans for the interior of Arabia, and those for the interior of Abyssinia and Upper Egypt (Dongola, Darfour, Sennaar, and Central Africa), take their supply of stocks from Jeddah, and bring their supplies of produce for sale to Jeddah. The exports consist chiefly of Mocha coffee, hides and skins, wool, ivory, camel's hair, wax, gums, tortoiseshell, mother-o'-pearl, ostrich feathers, senna, grey amber, coral, aloes, spices, balsam, drugs, incense, myrrh, &c. The imports are Manchester manufactures, Madapollams, grey shirtings, Turkey red yarn, American petroleum, tin-plates, candles, biscuits, hardware, knives, razors, scissors, locks, bolts, hinges, screws, nails, white metal spoons, petroleum lamps, leather travelling bags, crockeryware, jewellery, chains and watches, &c., &c.

The numbers of the "Faithful" prevented by the war from going to Mecca will be more than compensated by the greater numbers of those who will this year seek the "First Temple" not so much for individual advantage as for the purpose of praying for the safety of the Ottoman Dominions.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

THERE may be differences of opinion as to the advisability of attempting to render the Psalms into English verse; and byegone experiments of the kind have not been so uniformly successful as to preclude an unfavourable decision on that point. But if it is to be done at all, the work is such as might fittingly be entrusted to such a man as Lord Lorne, since the chief requirement is that the adapter should be a cultivated man, with a genuine musical ear, and a sincere appreciation of the original. Both these requisites are apparent in "The Book of Psalms, literally rendered in Verse," by the Marquis of Lorne (Macmillan); and, consequently, the attempt has resulted, if not exactly in a great success, in something very far removed from failure. Great praise is due both to the scrupulous following of the original text, and to the courageous modesty which impelled the author to give, in places, the received Scottish version of some of the best known Psalms side by side with his own attempt. Very often the comparison is decidedly in favour of the modern rendering, although in one or two instances, e.g. Nos. 23 and 121, Rous still holds his own. Amongst the best is the third version of No. 77, which is extremely musical, though possibly not so well adapted for congregational use as some of the simpler measures.

The author of "Carnal Christmas," by T. Smith (Belfast), means well, but seems to profess a rather gloomy sort of religion. He objects to family dinners, dances, and such "sinful levities," on the second great feast of the year, he likes long sermons, and has the hitherto unknown experience of so-called "Ritualist" churches in which the congregation do not join in the singing! Also, he appears to have ascended Mont Blanc.—"Pictures in Verse," by Thomas J. May (Remington and Co.), attracts by the elegance of its get-up; but the beautifully printed pages contain

THE CAMPAIGN IN ASIA: WITH THE RUSSIANS—FUGITIVE TURCO-ARMENIANS ON THE ROAD BETWEEN ALAVAL AND ERIVAN only the most abject rubbish. Prose is not necessarily poetry because it has been divided into short sentences containing ten syllables more or less.—"Watching for the Dead, and Other Poems," by Faith Chiltern (Provost), is one of those little collections of ephemeral religious verse so common nowadays. It is obviously from the pen of a pious and thoughtful woman, of rather a morbid turn of mind, and with somewhat untutored views as regards her beliefs. At the same time the verses are fairly musical, and need not be criticised from a severe standpoint.

It will be easily understood by their readers that "Poems, Lyrics, Songs, and Sonnets," by Francis Bennoch, F.S.A. (Hardwicke and Bogue), attracted no little attention on the occasion of their first appearance nearly forty years ago; but it is another question whether they will command equal appreciation upon their republication at the present day. Without wishing to detract from the author's undoubted merit, it must be said that the volume contains little more than echoes of greater men, and it is only the originators in any age who can hope for permanent influence. It is the lack of originality which must be fatal to poems such as these. In reading "The Storm" one can at most say, "Almost as good as some parts of Scott;" the Scotch songs, charming, musical, and humorous as some of them are, only suggest that Mr. Bennoch thoroughly understood such men as Motherwell and Tannahill; whilst the sonnets do not rise above the average. Still, many may linger with pleasure over such ditties as "The auld auld story" and "Pride maun learn to fa'" for the sake of that genuine humour which is a spécialité of Scottish song writers, and passages like effectually redeem the verses from the charge of commonplace. The author has been known and appreciated by some of the greatest literary minds of his day, and the esteem of Mary Russell Mitford and Nathaniel Hawthorne would alone suffice to prove that his intellect was one of no common order; but, as regards his poetry, he can aspire to shine only with borrowed light.

DRAWINGS BY THE ITALIAN MASTERS:
REPRODUCED BY THE
FROM THE
With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine tact. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. Of the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser ills that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed-for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

Topics of the Week

THE TALK OF PEACE.——There is a general disposition to believe that peace may not now be very far off. Let Russia, it is said, achieve a single splendid victory, and there is no reason why she should not bring the struggle to an end. On the other hand, since the Porte has given such very unexpected proof of military strength, she might, we hear, safely ask for fair terms. We have no doubt that if Turkey were prudent she would take the earliest opportunity of closing the war, since it is incredible that in the long run she should not be overcome. But we must not forget that the Turks look at the matter differently. They have full confidence in their power; and it seems probable that they are resolved to make a vigorous attempt not only to drive the Russians from their soil but to deliver themselves permanently from the European tutelage which they have long found so galling. While they hold out, Russia cannot think of peace. It is true that among a large class of Russian society there is a distinct reaction of feeling in regard to the war. The nation has been surprised to find that the task it undertook is so difficult; and it is now well known that the Bulgarians, who were the objects of so much compassion, are neither such good Christians nor so oppressed a people as they were supposed to be. They cheat their deliverers on every possible occasion, and are guilty of outrages as bad as those of the Bashi-Bazouks on the unfortunate Mohammedans who fall into their hands. Still, Russia has committed herself; and she cannot draw back in disgrace, or even with moderate laurels. If she were to retire at the present moment, she would for a generation be a cipher in European politics. We cannot, then, believe that there is the least hope of immediate peace. All the conditions are unfavourable to it; and any Power that ventured to offer serious mediation would be told to mind its own business. The prospect is a dismal one; but there is no use in shutting our eyes to plain facts.

THE COLLISION IN THE CHANNEL.——We should be loth in any way to prejudge the official opinion which will shortly be expressed concerning the loss of the Avalanche and the Forest, at the same time some general observations may not be out of place. Sailors are well aware that a sound ship when fairly out at sea runs little risk of injury, and that the chief perils of a voyage are to be found when a vessel is leaving or nearing port. These perils are especially great in the narrow seas which bound this island on the west and south. Lying as they do in a high latitude, the weather is often rough, and the nights for many months of the year are long, and intensely dark. Moreover, these seas are the most crowded maritime thoroughfares in the world. Compared with most other tracts of salt water on the earth's surface, they are, in point of traffic, as Fleet Street is to a country lane. The inevitable inference is that the utmost care ought to be taken in navigating vessels in a region beset with so many dangers. Yet what is the ordinary practice? If a Lancashire millowner were to start his factory some Monday morning with a number of new hands, picked up chance fashion, unaccustomed to the ways of the building and the machinery, and many of them stupefied by the effects of a previous Saturday night's spree, we should not be surprised if some serious accident followed. Yet this parallel rather understates the case, because there is no more risk of accident in working a cotton-mill at one time than at another, whereas a sea-captain enters on the most perilous part of his voyage with a crew who are strangers to each other, and some of whom often come on board incapacitated by drink. To turn to another point. In these days of advanced chemical science, why should not ships, so long as they are within a certain distance of the United Kingdom, be compelled to burn far brighter lights than they now do? What is now styled a "bright light" looks, no doubt, brilliant enough to the people who are within half-a-dozen yards of it, but it is a poor, dim affair to people at a distance. Compare the size of a hansom cab with an ordinary merchantman, and then compare the size of the lights they respectively carry. A really brilliant light, such as would cast a distinct reflection on the water, would not cost much for the few days during which a ship was within Channel limits, and it would enable vessels to give one another a wide berth long before there was any risk of collision.

M. GAMBETTA AND THE DUC DE BROGLIE.——There can be little doubt that the Duc de Broglie bitterly regrets the course he rashly adopted in regard to M. Gambetta. He intended either to silence his most formidable opponent during the time of tne elections or permanently to disgrace him; and now it seems very doubtful whether he will be able to inflict upon him the smallest punishment. On Tuesday judgment went by default; and although, when the case is tried, the sentence will probably be sustained, it will still be open to M. Gambetta to appeal. And in appealing he may cause delay by again declining to appear in the first instance. Thus he will be a free man until the elections are over; and when they are past he will be beyond the reach of his enemies. It is singular that the Premier did not perceive that he could be so easily thwarted. He will, we may hope, find that the blow which he rashly aimed at the leader of the Opposition recoils upon himself. M. Gambetta has hitherto displayed admirable temper. He has not allowed himself to be provoked into a single utterance he could not justify before the world; he has acted with the calm prudence of a man who knows that he has a good cause, and that he can confidently anticipate its ultimate triumph. The Duc de Broglie, on the contrary, has gone from one act of violence to another. Every form of the Constitution has been strained for the benefit of his party; and he has not even had the skill to unite those who nominally follow him. The so-called Conservatives form a heterogeneous mass, the various members of which still hate each other almost as heartily as they detest the Republicans. It would be an insult to France to suppose that she can hesitate between two such men and two such policies. If she gives up the Republic for the sake of an intriguer like the Duc de Broglie, she will prove to all the world that the simple reason why she does not possess freedom is that she does not deserve it.

PRISON REFORM.——The Prisons Act—one of the few Ministerial sheaves successfully garnered at the close of a singularly unfruitful Parliamentary harvest—would be a bad bargain if its undoubted conveniences were purchased with the ill-will of the country gentlemen. Goldsmith's remark about "a bold peasantry" applies with equal force to a resident landed gentry. They can be destroyed, but they cannot be easily supplied, and nothing has so much tended to the conservation of our English landowners as the fact that from ancient times they have not been mere rent collectors, but men engaged in the performance of various useful and honourable public duties in their respective neighbourhoods. It was not unnatural, then, that some feeling of jealousy should be aroused when it was announced that the Government—a Tory Government, too—was about to deprive rural magnates of one of their most cherished privileges, the control of the local gaols, and place these establishments under the immediate superintendence of the State. An examination, however, of the provisions of the measure which has recently become law will show that the susceptibilities of local authorities have been tenderly treated, and that, in the matter of prison management, a substantial share of influence, if not of absolute power, is still conceded to them. As regards the necessity of the change which has been made, it may be attributed almost entirely to the revolution effected by steam and electricity. When communication was slow and difficult, every town, as a matter of course, had its receptacle for prisoners. Now, when a prisoner can be carried with ease and safety in a few hours from one end of the country to another, such a number of separate establishments has become unnecessary, and concentration, involving greater economy and greater uniformity of discipline, becomes advisable. And it should be remembered that the principle of Government control over prisoners has been established for many years. The convicts sent to Australia passed into the hands of the State, and, as transportation was gradually abolished, large State establishments for convicts arose in various parts of the country. So that for a long time past it is only the comparatively petty offenders who have been under local control; and, if the new system conduces to the better discipline of the prisoners and to the saving of public money, country gentlemen will, we feel sure, endure with cheerfulness some curtailment of their time-honoured privileges.

HERESY IN SCOTLAND.——A Glasgow Presbytery has been engaged this week in discussing another case of heresy. Instances of this kind have become so common among our Northern neighbours that they are now regarded with comparative indifference. The only feeling they seem to excite is a little indignation at the "heresy hunters." It must be admitted that the genuine heresy hunter is not a pleasant specimen of humanity; charity, to say the least, is not his strong point. On the other hand, we do not think he quite receives justice at the hands of those who are fond of making him the object of cheap satire. In the first place, he is a thoroughly logical man. Having accepted certain premisses, he advances boldly to the conclusions, not shrinking from them because they are attended by some difficulties and are capable of being disagreeably stated. Now, it is precisely here that the persons he hunts down are usually weakest. They are kind-hearted men, with fine sympathies; but they are not logical. There is nothing they dislike so much as clear statement and frank reasoning; they prefer to dwell in an atmosphere of mild sentiment and gentle platitude. How can we wonder that the robust orthodox theologian has an instinctive dislike of thinkers of so very weak a type? And after all, has he not some reason for his dislike? The heretics of the Scotch Churches seem to forget that by associating themselves with a particular communion they come under certain obligations which they have no right to shirk. Many of them have altogether departed both from the spirit and letter of the dogmas they nominally undertook to teach. It is rather hard to tell them that in these circumstances they ought to resign positions which they no longer find congenial; for they naturally object to beginning the world all over again. But they should not expect to enjoy the advantages of freedom and of bondage at the same time. They should have the courage of their opinions, and either secure complete liberty by the sacrifice of worldly comfort, or submit with good humour to opposition which they themselves provoke.

ALPINE ACCIDENTS.——Some persons may take advantage of the sad disaster on the Lyskamm to inveigh against the foolishness of Alpine climbing. We shall not follow their example. All active amusements are attended with a certain amount of risk, and considering the number of persons who now every year scale snowy peaks which their ancestors were content to admire from the valleys below, serious accidents are rare, and mountain-climbing may be pronounced to be quite as safe as bicycling or cricket, and decidedly safer than fox-hunting, roller-skating, or polo-playing. Moreover, it is just because Englishmen love these somewhat hazardous pastimes that they are such an enterprising race, who have carried their flag into every corner of the world, temperate, tropical, or arctic. Everybody remembers the Iron Duke's saying that Waterloo was won on the Eton playing fields, and it is worth, too, noting that a nation fond of open-air sports is usually a peaceable nation. Our Continental neighbours, who are more sedentary in their pleasures, are too apt to seek for excitement in war or revolution. An international cricket match or regatta against an Australian or American cousin provides for John Bull an excellent substitute for military glory, without the blood and tears which are the invariable accompaniments of the latter. At present the nations of the Continent are sadly behindhand in these matters, but we do not despair of a time coming (say some fifty years hence) when France and Germany will play international cricket matches, and when the mutual rivalry of Turk and Muscovite will be satisfied by a grand international polo-match between Bashi-Bazouks and Cossacks. It is for these weighty reasons that, though we regret the death of the poor fellows on the Lyskamm, we do not desire to discourage Alpine adventure.

THE INTERNATIONAL.——A few years ago the International Association was an object of dread to every Government in Europe It seemed to have sprung suddenly, full armed, into existence; and as nobody quite knew what force was behind it, timid citizens regarded it with horror. The general indifference to the Society is now so great that probably few people are aware that the annual Congress has been sitting this week in Ghent. It is possible that, so far as this particular body is concerned, not much danger is to be apprehended; but, whether people realise the fact or not, the International is still unquestionably associated with one of the most powerful social forces of the present era. The ordinary subjects of political discussion occupy from day to day the minds of the middle class all over the Western World; but beneath that class are vast numbers of men who care nothing whatever for ordinary politics, but are very deeply interested in the question how wealth is to be more evenly distributed. In every European country Socialism—less as a system of beliefs than as a tendency—exercises a potent influence. Even the Eastern Question is of comparatively slight moment to those who are under the spell; they think only of the welfare of their class, not of the supposed interests of nations. We in England come less in contact with the movement than any of our Continental neighbours; but even here there are elements which may some day assume a form our statesmen will not at all like. In the United States the demands of the men in the late strike had a decidedly Socialistic character; and we observe that a working man has been allowed to express in the North American Review opinions which, if logically carried out, would result in transforming the State into an enormous industrial organisation for the benefit of the labourers. The writer is singularly moderate in tone; but his principles are sufficiently drastic, and the well informed correspondent of the Daily News considers him a fair representative of his class. It is in this direction, we believe, that the real fight of the future lies; and Governments would act wisely by preparing for it—not by acts of suppression, but by promoting popular education, and allying themselves heartily with every true effort to elevate the mass of mankind.

Gas Meters.——A correspondence, highly interesting to gas consumers, has lately appeared in the columns of the Standard. The point raised is, Are the meters infallible?—and the evidence brought forward seems to show that these ingenious pieces of mechanism are, like other works of human construction, liable to go wrong occasionally. Now comes a question which we ask with some diffidence. If a meter registers less gas than is actually being consumed, no doubt the Company's inspector pounces down on the offender and replaces it by a more trustworthy tell-tale. But imagine the converse phenomenon. Suppose that the index of the meter is travelling quicker than it righteously ought to travel. Is the Company's inspector equally keen to point out its defectiveness? We do not say he is not, but we do say that this correspondence has made us feel uncomfortable. We have had a meter hidden away for years in a dark corner under the stairs. We don't feel, however, that we have any personal acquaintance with him, as we have with the clock which we wind up every Sunday morning. The meter is a mystery to us. We see his face, but his works are jealously hidden from us. How can we feel sure that during the lapse of years he may not be another good meter gone wrong? And yet it is he, this inscrutable Mystery, and the Gas Company who, between them, settle the amount of our quarterly bill for gas. We should like an occasional visit from an independent inspector, unconnected with the Company, who would look into our Meter's inside and make sure that he is telling the truth.

THE NEW ART GALLERY AT LIVERPOOL

This splendid building, which is the gift of Mr. A. B. Walker, the Mayor of Liverpool, and which has cost more than 30,000*l.*, is in the Grecian style of architecture, from the designs of two local architects, Mr. C. Sherlock and the late Mr. H. H. Vale, and it consists of two floors, on each of which are four large well-lighted rooms. The lower floor will be used as a Permanent Gallery of paintings, whilst the upper will be available for an annual exhibition for new works, and for occasional Loan Exhibitions. The building is now fully stocked with oil and water-colour paintings and statuary, some of the works being on permanent exhibition, others for sale, and others on temporary loan. One room is occupied by a fine collection of Japanese ceramic ware, the property of Major James Walter.

The opening ceremony last week was the occasion of much festivity; the whole town made holiday, business being almost entirely suspended. A procession of trade and friendly societies, with banners and emblems, conducted Lord Derby and Mr. Walker from the Town Hall through the principal streets to a platform in front of the building, around which a large crowd had assembled. Here Mr. Walker, as the donor, presented the key of the building to Mr. Alderman Weightman, who accepted the gift on behalf of the townsfolk. Then addresses of thanks, one from the Town Council, signed with its official seal, and another from the public, contained in a silver casket, were presented to Mr. Walker, who made a short and modest speech in reply, concluding by calling on Lord Derby to declare the building open. This his Lordship did, amidst the cheers of the crowd, speaking of the munificence and usefulness of the gift. The Vocalists' Union then sang a part of the 100th Psalm, and afterwards, while the band played the National Anthem, Mr. Walker and Lord Derby, with the chief member of the party, walked from the platform to the Gallery, which was thrown open with a blare of trumpets. An inspection of the building was afterwards made, and later in the day the public were admitted to the full capacity of the rooms. In the evening there was a display of fireworks in Wavertree Park, and other popular amusements, and Mr. Walker was entertained at a banquet in St. George's Hall, the Earl of Derby presiding.

Mr. Andrew Barclay Walker, the donor of the Art Gallery, is a Scotchman by birth and parentage. He is the second son of Mr. Peter Walker, formerly of the Fort Brewery, Ayr, who removed his business to Liverpool while young Andrew was still at school. When his education was completed, he was taken into partnership by his father, and the prosperity of the firm was such as to enable him to amass great wealth. The brewing business is now greatly extended, and to it is added a large trade in wine and spirits, and Mr. Walker has also become owner of large collieries in South Wales. He was for four years major of the 1st Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, of which corps Lord Derby is Hon. Colonel. He became a member of the Town Council in 1867, and some years afterwards, on the death of the late Mr. R. W. Houghton, he succeeded to the vacant aldermanic chair. In 1874 he was elected Mayor of Liverpool, and it was on his assumption of that office that he made the splendid offer of building this Art Gallery. This year he is again mayor of the town, his re-election being doubtless intended as some slight acknowledgement of his munificence.

THE WAR IN THE EAST

WITH THE TURKS—RASGRAD

Rasgrad, where the headquarters of Mehemet Ali Pasha were shifted after his departure from Shumla, is a town on the Ak-Lour, on the road between Shumla and Rustchuk. It lies in an elevated position above a ravine, and consequently affords great facilities for defence, as may be seen by our sketch.

EXECUTION OF BULGARIAN SPIES

"The number of Bulgarian spies who infest our camp," writes our artist, "is indescribable, several are arrested daily, so that they now excite little or no comment. The courts appointed to try them, in order that they may not be taxed with partiality, ordinarily release them, as their status as spy cannot be mathematically proved. A terrible exception, however, has just proved the rule. Two spies, dressed as Bulgarians, were arrested, and on being searched were found to possess such condemnatory documents that the Court sentenced them to be shot within twenty-four hours. The execution took place in the European manner, and need not be described; but I may here remark that shouting a soldier is altogether a new custom for the Ottoman army; formerly the Commander, or even the Sultan himself, would strike the head off an offending soldier. At present, however, the criminal is methodically tried and executed as in Europe."

A PASS IN THE BALKANS

The range of the Balkans, as is well known, is a singularly irregular chain of mountains, which are pierced by passes so narrow and overshadowed by such huge heights that the light from beneath appears almost excluded. One of these is represented in our sketch—the beautiful Gorge in the Derbend Balkans, an outlying spur of the range, between Osman Bazar and Eski-Djuma.

WITH THE RUSSIANS—BIELA

Biela, which was taken by General Arnoldi on the 5th ult., was shortly afterwards made the headquarters of the Czar and his staff. We recently depicted the residence there of our military attaché, Colonel Wellesley, and now portray the headquarters which the Czar occupied during his stay, and which until lately formed the palace of the Turkish Bey or governor. Now that the Czar has gone further westward to the battle-field of Plevna, the town has become the headquarters of the Czarevitch.

CONSTANTINOPLE—THE ECLIPSE OF THE MOON

An ancient Oriental legend states that the shadow which veils the moon during an eclipse is a huge dragon trying to devour our valuable satellite. As such a deed, if accomplished, would prove exceedingly awkward to the world in general, Mussulmans from time immemorial have been in the habit, when this monster makes his appearance, of firing at him with muskets loaded with ball. Taking advantage of this custom, practical jokers and street arabs frequently amuse themselves with discharging innumerable fire-arms, while assassins are by no means slow to utilise the occasion. Since the declaration of war, however, the Turkish authorities determined to put a stop to a custom which gave rise to serious troubles, and accordingly previous to the recent eclipse criers were sent round the streets of Constantinople announcing that no gun was to be fired at the moon under the penalty of a fine of 6*l.*, confiscation of the weapon, and several days' imprisonment. This order was obeyed throughout the capital, and the eclipse of the 23rd ult. was probably the first which has not been saluted with salvoes of small arms for some centuries past. One of the most curious features of the affair was the phraseology of the crier, who loudly averred that the sun was about to intervene between the earth and the moon, and accordingly would overshadow the latter for some hours.

A RUSSIAN FLAG OF TRUCE

This is a sketch in the camp of Fuad Pasha, one of the subordinates of Mehemet Ali Pasha, who upon entering upon his command paid considerable attention to the organisation of the ambulances. In order the better to effect this he sent a messenger to the Grand Duke Nicholas asking for a definitive answer as to whether Russia would respect the "Red Crescent" in the same manner as the "Red Cross" is recognised by the Ottoman forces. In answer to this request the Grand Duke sent the emissaries in our sketch under a flag of truce to Fuad Pasha's quarters. Upon their arrival they were blindfolded, and led to the Commander's tent. The chief of the party, a lieutenant-colonel, after complimenting Fuad Pasha on the Turkish artillery, complained that the Circassians decapitated the Cossack wounded. To this Fuad Pasha replied that he could in no way excuse such barbarity, but retorted that the Cossacks themselves frequently committed great cruelties on the Turkish women and children. "I was not aware of that," answered the officer; "I will inform the Grand Duke of it." The eyes of the Russians were again bandaged, and they were reconducted outside the limits of the camp by Captain Annesley, an Englishman serving with the Turks.

IN THE SHIPKA PASS—GENERAL DRAGIMIROFF WOUNDED

On the 24th ult., during the fighting in the Shipka Pass, the Russian General Dragimiroff, after bringing the reinforcements from his own division, the Podolsk regiment, to General Radetsky, joined that officer and his staff, who were surveying the battle from the slope of a peak. "The bullets here," writes Mr. Forbes, who, together with our artist, was present at the time, "are singing like a nest of angry wasps. One bullet strikes on the left knee General Dragimiroff, who has been standing calmly in the face of the fire looking down upon the battle. One of the best generals in the Russian army is hors de combat. He is as brave as he is skilful; he never so much as takes his spectacles off, but gently sits down, and ripping up his trowser-leg binds a handkerchief round the wound. Surgeons

THE WAR AND THE ECLIPSE—THE PUBLIC CRIER OF CONSTANTINOPLE WARNING THE POPULACE NOT TO FIRE AT THE MOON DURING THE ECLIPSE gather round him, but, like the true soldier he is, he says he will take his turn when it comes. He is carried out of the line of fire somewhat, his boot removed, and the limb bandaged; then he is placed on a stretcher and is borne away. The last words on the noble soldier's lips are a fervent wish for good fortune to the arms of the Czar."

BULGARIAN PEASANTS FLYING FROM THE CIRCASSIANS

"When the Turks," writes our artist, "evacuated the Dobrudscha they left behind the Circassian irregulars, who entirely depopulated the country, driving the inhabitants before them in the direction of Varna. Now these people are escaping and coming back by thousands—mostly on foot, for the Circassians have robbed them of cattle; some naked, for they have been despoiled of their clothes, so much so that men often wear only one woman's petticoat for their entire costume. The scene I have hastily sketched I came across near Kustendje, where the cavalcade was passing the line of mounds known as Trajan's Wall. Tumuli are seen on every hill, and these mark old battle-grounds, being filled with bones of dead men. Two walls (the inner one of stone) extend from Kustendje to Tchernavoda, and for six miles from Kustendje there are three walls. At frequent intervals are fortified camps. Except at Medjidie, Kustendje, and Tchernavoda there isn't a tree to be found in this part of the Dobrudscha; indeed the whole country may be said to be treeless, exhibiting a most perfect theatre to observe military movements."

LAUNCHING CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE

This operation, entrusted to Messrs. John and Wayman Dixon, C.E., began on the 28th August, and two days' later, the obelisk, enclosed in the iron cylinder which had been prepared for its reception, had been successfully launched into seven feet of water. The work was temporarily delayed, owing to water having leaked in through a man-hole, and to the insufficient power of the tugs, but the launch was successfully accomplished on Friday morning, the 7th inst. The needle in its iron case was towed round to the harbour for the fittings to be completed, and proved very steady at sea. Our engraving, which is from a sketch by Mr. Charles Royle, of Alexandria, represents the first day's proceedings, when the rolling of the huge monster into the sea was begun. The length of the cylinder is 92 ft., and its diameter 15 ft. The iron ship when afloat has a draught of 9 ft., and a displacement of 280 tons.

THE FAMINE IN CHINA

The crops having failed in the Province of Shantung, great distress has prevailed amongst the people there for the last few months. But in addition to hunger they have suffered intensely from the cold, the winter being always severe in that part of China. Immense numbers of refugees have been flocking southward—this place (Chinkiang) attracting a good many. They have erected straw huts around about here in every sheltered spot, and live in the most wretched manner. Many of them are only too ready to part with their little ones to procure sustenance. The sketch "For Sale," represents what the artist actually was at Chinkiang, a mother conveying her children to town to be sold. They were all fine healthy looking little things.

In corroboration of the above, a Roman Catholic missionary, Père Marchi, thus describes, in the Tablet of the 8th inst., the distress prevailing in the district of Lin Kin:—"Fancy a vast tract of land, as it were, devastated by brigands; fields uncultivated, either for want of hands, or because the famished peasants have not the necessary strength to bear the fatigues of husbandry, and the houses destroyed in order to sell the timber; in many houses there remains only one room where the wretched family shelter themselves from the inclemency of the weather. In the almost deserted villages you see but exhausted, cadaverous faces. How many families have become totally extinct through starvation; how many have gone elsewhere, after having sold their all at any price, without hope of return? But there is something worse. How many fathers of families who once lived honourably have committed suicide in order to avoid the ignominy of begging, all their family following the dreadful example! How many woe-stricken women—wives, sisters, daughters—have been sold by their fathers, brothers, and husbands to unknown people, till in some places you hardly see any females left! A Christian literate of this district assured me that in Lin Kin-hsien alone more than 100,000 women and children have been sold, which is shown by a register kept at the Yamen. . . . In several places of this district they were able to sow wheat, and it promises well, especially after the last rain, but to the south-east, in the midst of the hills where I now am, and where hardly any foreigner has penetrated, the land looks like a wilderness; there is neither wheat nor millet, and if ever they sow any late crop they must wait till the autumn for the harvest."—Our engraving is from a sketch by Mr. E. H. Grimani.

THE FUNERAL OF M. THIERS

It is difficult for us in this fortunate island to realise the bitterness of party spirit in France. For a parallel we must go back to the days of Charles the Second, when Whigs and Tories alternately proscribed and persecuted each other. This unresting animosity has been the means of depriving him who was at the time of his death the foremost man in France of the honour of a State funeral. It is needless to inquire who were most to blame. Each party thoroughly distrusted its opponent. The Government feared that if Madame Thiers' conditions were complied with the ceremony would be turned into an ultra-Radical demonstration; the Republicans feared that if the Government took the matter into its own hands, they, the Republicans, would be practically excluded from any participation in it. Nevertheless, though the original intention of a State funeral was abandoned, the ceremonial of Saturday last was of a very imposing, and thoroughly national, character.

Many a lover of true freedom must have gone to bed on Saturday night with a lighter heart on learning that all had passed off quietly. The Parisians are fond of "demonstrating," especially at funerals, and anything like a "row" would have been made an excuse by the present reactionary Government for proclaiming a state of siege, and withdrawing the small amount of individual liberty which now exists.

The Parisians, however, on this occasion exercised an admirable self-restraint. They "demonstrated," it is true, but it was a demonstration of silence, the few cries raised were promptly suppressed, and so the army of soldiers and policemen with whom the Government (conscious of its own unpopularity) had filled the streets had nothing to do but to stand and get wet.

All Saturday forenoon the rain came down in torrents. The corpse may be happy, according to the popular saying, "which the rain rains on," but the living men and women who come to gaze on the spectacle are made decidedly uncomfortable by an excess of moisture on such occasions, and as Frenchmen, like cats, are particularly averse to getting wet, the fortitude with which tens of thousands of them endured the bad weather of Saturday proves the earnestness of their desire to honour the memory of M. Thiers.

The hearse, which appeared before M. Thiers' mansion about 10.30 A.M. to carry away the mortal remains of the deceased, bore testimony to his popularity, for it was literally buried in flowers, wreaths, and bouquets sent from different parts of France, besides which eight porters had to carry a number of other floral decorations for which there was no room on the car. The six horses which drew the vehicle were richly caparisoned, and were led by pikemen wearing black and silver liveries and cocked hats. Messrs. Mignet, Vuitry, Grévy, Jules Simon, De Sacy, Jules Favre, and Admiral Pothuau were the pall-bearers. The police would not allow the banners of trade corporations and of towns to be unfurled except those of Belfort, Marseilles, Versailles, and St. Germain-en-Laye; but this order was evaded to a great extent by the use of armlets bearing suitable inscriptions. The procession contained representatives of interests of the most varied character. Of course there were Parliament men, Senators and Deputies; there was the Diplomatic Body, less the Papal Nuncio; there were delegates of provincial towns and municipal councils, and of miners and other industrial pursuits.

The funeral service took place in the Church of Notre Dame de Lorette, the Archbishop of Paris, probably acting under orders from the intolerant camarilla which rules at the Vatican, having refused the use of the Madeleine. Messrs. Gambetta, Victor Hugo, and Louis Blanc heard the Mass; but at least a third of those who had invitations did not follow the coffin into the church, their anti-clerical feelings being revived by Mgr. Guibert's small-mindedness. When the procession quitted the church at 1 P.M. for the cemetery of Père de la Chaise the rain had ceased. The roads were lined by an infinite multitude of people, in which the procession, grand and numerous as it was, was lost. On turning the angle of any boulevard one beheld a sea of people, nothing of them visible but their faces, and those turned towards the procession. The cemetery having been reached, the coffin was taken from the hearse and followed by the family on foot to the vault, an unpretending structure near Lafitte's tomb, inscribed "Famille Dosne-Thiers." All the floral crowns and bouquets were placed upon it, and after the last prayers had been recited, five speeches were delivered, the most important of which were by Messrs. Grévy and Jules Simon. These speeches were marked by the same self-restraint which had characterised the behaviour of the multitude; but nevertheless they could scarcely praise M. Thiers' conduct towards the Assembly without blaming by implication the present Executive, which assuredly does not in any way represent the will of the nation. Altogether, the 8th September was a day of no small note in the annals of France, and the Assemblée Nationale (a Government print) is perhaps not far wrong when it speaks of the demonstration as "an insurrection, but a dumb insurrection."

"CELIA'S ARBOUR"

"THE CAPTURE OF A 32-POUNDER"

Just now, when men's minds are saturated with descriptions of bloodshed and destruction, this picture comes as an agreeable relief. As in Sir Edwin Landseer's well-known picture of "Peace," where a lamb is nibbling the grass which has grown in the mouth of a long-disused cannon, so here we are transplanted to an atmosphere of quiet and contentment. The muzzle of the gun—one of the old orthodox pattern, made before men of science had revolutionised artillery—points toward the sea, aiming at an enemy who has long since ceased to exist. It has now become the plaything of a party of children, who love nothing better than to sit astride of the trunnions, and fancy themselves soldiers. A little one, whose activities are less fully developed, is endeavouring to imitate the example of her seniors, and climb up from behind; while even the dog would fain join in the fun. Mr. Birket Foster informs us that he saw the incident which he has sketched at Margate, and thought it would make a good picture.—Our engraving is published by permission of the owner of the picture, Mr. Sharpley Bainbridge, of Lincoln.

SKETCHES IN KAFFRARIA

"These sketches are all studies from life taken during a journey I lately made through Kaffraria. The first represents a Dutch boer leaving his farm with his family, goods, and chattels on account of a native outbreak. It also conveys a good idea of the mode of travelling in the interior. The second, which was taken on a Kaffir location, is a sketch of a 'nongololo,' or native war dance, the men 'gyre and gimble on the wabe' as 'Alice' has it) to the monotonous, but not unmusical, chants of the women, who mark time by clapping of hands. On special occasions the natives meet together on certain locations by hundreds, even to a couple of thousand or so, when the effect is singularly wild and weird. After keeping the dancing up for a day and night, or even more, they set to and demolish an ox or two by way of refreshment. No. 3 is a portrait taken from life of a Kaffir belle. She is costumed de rigueur for some state occasion such as I have alluded to, her face is besmeared most artistically with a mixture of red clay and oil, which to the native mind considerably enhances the natural beauty and charm of the countenance. The last sketch is one of melancholy interest, for it shows the burial place of some officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the 74th Regiment, who fell victims during the last Kaffir War. By yonder mountains they were surprised and massacred most cruelly, and on this occasion it was that their Colonel (Colonel Fordyce) was killed. But scant traces now remain even of their graves. This sketch was taken near Fort Hadden, whereabouts some of the more terrible sufferings were undergone by the troops engaged in that campaign."—We are indebted to U. G. Doyle Glanville, of Adelaide, South Africa, for the drawings and for these above details.

THEATRES

Mr. Byron's new romantic drama, entitled Guinea Gold; or, Lights and Shadows of London Life, produced at the Princess's Theatre on Monday evening, belongs to a class of pieces in which nearly everything is subordinated to the main object of introducing elaborate mechanical contrivances in connection with incidents of an exciting and terrifying character. The unquestionable success which has attended Mr. Boucicault's efforts in this way has not unnaturally inspired managers with faith in the attractions of these incidental features of melodrama though it is not easy to cite instances of plays which can in strictness be said to have enjoyed great favour on the strength of these contrivances alone. The Colleen Bawn, for example, was essentially what is known as a "sensation" piece; but its story, apart from its stage carpentry and lime-light effects, happened to possess considerable interest. The same may be said of Mr. Falconer's Peep o' Day, and Mr. Boucicault's Arrah na Pogue and The Shaughraun, the latter play having the additional advantage of some excellent character sketches. Most frequenters of the theatres, moreover, can recall examples of plays which have fulfilled all the conditions of the "sensation" drama, and yet have failed to prove attractive; and, on the other hand, we have only to mention Mr. Tom Taylor's Ticket of Leave Man to show how possible it is for a piece of the romantic school to achieve an immense popularity without a scene in it dependent on mechanism or vulgar terrors. Mr. Byron would do well to give to these facts his serious consideration. His latest piece is an outrage upon common sense and an insult to audiences. No one, we suspect, is better aware than Mr. Byron himself of the worthless character of this production which he has attempted to palm upon the public; but the simple truth is that he believes it to be quite good enough to fill pit and gallery, and a fair proportion of seats in stalls and boxes. To say that he is mistaken in this view would involve us in the perilous ways of prophecy; but we can with perfect safety, and with a good conscience, affirm that it would be a circumstance of evil augury for the welfare of our stage if such a drama as Guinea Gold should prove remunerative to the manager who has placed it on the stage. The mechanical scenes on which the piece relies are not new inventions. Peril from a sudden inundation, it is true, is not quite so familiar as a house on fire, or a fall from a precipice or a castle keep; and possibly Mr. Byron is the first playwright who has turned to account the comparatively mild phenomenon of a high tide in Rotherhithe; but hairbreadth escapes from rising waters are an old source of excitement both on the French and English stage. Yet this, and an escape from a high window by clinging to ivy growing up the walls—an incident copied exactly from one of Mr. Boucicault's dramas, even to the peculiar machinery for turning the building inside out—are the cardinal points of Mr. Byron's play; and for the sake of these any attempt at truth, probability, or consistency has evidently been deemed altogether superfluous. As regards the story of the play we have little to say. The problem has been to get the heroine into the dreadful underground Rotherhithe cellar just in time to be nearly drowned by the flood, and rescued by her lover; and again to furnish her with a plausible motive for jumping out of window in the manner described. This is accomplished by representing her as persecuted by a fellow who, being a curious compound of hardened villainy and romantic love, decoys her into the cellar in one act and frightens her out of window in another. Having told this, what need to explain the function of the foolish old lady who adopts the friendless heroine, the still more foolish detective who never detects anything wrong till it is too late, of the maudlin old gambler and forger who discovers in the portrait of the heroine the features of his lost child, of the stage-struck young man and his vulgar sweetheart who are always retarding the progress of the story by irrelevant buffoonery, of the page-boy whose impertinences contribute so large a proportion of the dialogue, or of any other of the personages with which the author has encumbered his play?

Mr. Irving has been performing in Liverpool to the great satisfaction of large audiences. The Liverpool critics, however, seem rather at a loss for apt expressions to convey their feelings on the occasion. The critic of the Liverpool Post, for example, speaks of the actor's "celebrated flashes of contagious inspiration," and declares that Mr. Irving has "accomplished the revelation of Hamlet's idiosyncrasy with unprecedented insight and potency of interpretation." Further, this writer begs leave to "direct the attention of the public to the masterly manner in which the fine and patient play of the histrionic sculptor's most delicate chisel has brought to the very suppleness and subtlety of life what once were comparatively speaking rough-hewn masses of intellectual creation." All this is rather vague, but it shows that the critic was greatly delighted.

The Folly Theatre will reopen this evening with comic operas entitled The Sea Nymphs and La Créole.—Mr. Rowe's comedy entitled Brass has been withdrawn at the Haymarket, where Mr. J. S. Clarke, the American comedian, will reappear this evening in Paul Pry.—On Monday the Olympic will reopen with a dramatic version of Mr. Collins's story, The Moonstone, which has been prepared for the stage by Mr. Collins himself.—A version of Le Homard, by Mr. Burnand, is to be produced at the Gaiety. The popular Gaiety Saturday matinées will shortly be resumed at Mr. Hollingshead's theatre.—The late Lord Lytton's posthumous play, entitled the House of Darnley, is to be produced in New York.

The Mohawk Minstrels.——Mr. Edgar Mowbray had a full house for his benefit on Wednesday, and he fully deserved it, for the curious quaint and beautiful Old Ballads which had been rummaged out for the occasion were sung in a delightful manner by the members of the troupe. The programme included "Barbara Allen," "The Vicar of Bray," "Black-eyed Susan," "Sally in our Alley," and "Down among the Dead Men." There was also a musical representation of "Merrie Islington in the Olden Time," and "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington" was given in the costume of the time of Queen Elizabeth.

Messrs. Hamilton's new Panorama now exhibiting at the Agricultural Hall is well worthy of a visit from all who feel interested in the War (and who do not). Starting from London, the spectator is taken on an imaginary Continental tour, the various places and scenes being most vividly portrayed from sketches taken on the spot. An explanatory lecture accompanies the display of the pictures, and adds greatly to their charm and value.

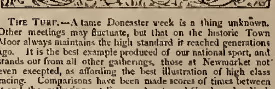
HOME.

Political Affairs.——The chief political speeches since our last issue have been those of Lord Derby at Liverpool and Mr. Roebuck at Sheffield, both delivered on the same day. Lord Derby in allusion to the war said: "If I were to describe in one sentence the attitude and feeling of the Government I would say that we shall do what we can to pull our neighbours out of the ditch, but that in doing so we shall be very careful that they don't pull us in." He added that the Indian Famine was even graver, in his mind, than the Eastern Question, and that it was engaging the utmost care and thought of the Government. Mr. Roebuck spoke emphatically on the subject of the war, declaring that both the Turkish and Russian Governments were a disgrace to humanity. He praised the conduct of the Ministry, and wound up with the words, "Peace, peace, my countrymen, but don't be afraid of war."—Mr. Butt has written a letter to an Irish clergyman denouncing the policy of obstruction in Parliament as being more disastrous and less dignified than rebellion in the field, and as calculated to make constitutional action hopeless, alienating the English Democracy, causing Ireland to be despised abroad as unfit for representative institutions, and giving an impetus to passions which should be assuaged. He declares that he will forfeit popularity and his seat in Parliament rather than sanction for an hour the resort to an unconstitutional course of conduct that can bring to the cause of Ireland nothing but disaster and disgrace.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson made one of his amusing speeches the other day at an agricultural dinner at Carlisle. He said that in Parliament each party had a "whip," who called his political hounds together by means of a little circular earnestly requesting their attendance. If the circular came without a dash or stroke under the word "earnestly" it meant there was some business that night coming on; if there was one dash it meant you ought to come; if two dashes it meant you should come; if three you must come; and if four it meant stay away at your peril.—Dr. Kenealy must really be a very ill-used man. During the last few days he has it seems been making a sort of political triumphant progress through Stoke, Burslem, Hanley, and other contiguous places, but the local reporters have tried to pluck the laurels from his brow by sending lying reports to the newspapers recounting how he had been everywhere hissed, hooted, and mobbed, so that he had to seek the protection of the police. This at all events is what the doctor said at Hanley on Saturday, but on Monday his recollection of the facts seems to have been somewhat different, for he then issued an address to his constituents bitterly complaining of "the savage hate and cruel fury of local Tories and Liberals, who have shown the fury of wild beasts, and would murder him if they could. Wherever he goes he is assailed by these villains, who have conspired to annihilate him. Obeying a sense of public duty, however, he has determined to remain at his post, and disappoint the powers of darkness."

Fatal Collision in the Channel.——A terrible collision took place on Tuesday night off Portland between the Avalanche, an emigrant ship from London to New Zealand, with about 100 persons on board, passengers and crew, and the Forest, a ballast-laden ship, belonging to Windsor, Nova Scotia. The Avalanche, an iron vessel, foundered immediately, and it is thought that all her passengers and crew except three are drowned. The Forest was so badly damaged that she was abandoned, the captain and crew getting away in three boats, in which they beat about all night. In the morning one of these boats was descried by some fishermen on the beach, who at once bravely put off to its aid, and succeeded in bringing the occupants safely to shore. The other boats are supposed to have been lost, and the ship Forest is also thought to have gone down. Out of a total of 118 souls on board both vessels, only twelve persons appear to have been saved, viz., three of the crew of the Avalanche, and nine of that of the Forest. The captain of the Forest says that about 9 P.M. on Tuesday he was on deck, and saw a ship bearing down upon him, he had the helm "luffed," and ordered a "flare up" to be lit. Before that could be done the ships were in collision, and the Avalanche went down within two minutes. He afterwards found that his own vessel was in a sinking state, and told his men to save themselves as best they could. It is said that the Avalanche when off Sheerness on the previous Sunday, ran into a foreign vessel, but received no material damage.

London Mortality further declined last week, and 1,180 deaths were registered against 1,238 during the previous seven days, a decline of 58, being 257 below the average, and at the rate of 17·4 per 1,000. There were 8 deaths from small-pox (the lowest number registered in any week since September, 1876), 23 from measles (an increase of 5), 17 from scarlet fever (a decrease of 9), 7 from diphtheria, 19 from whooping-cough, 21 from different forms of fever (an increase of 3, but being 14 below the average), and 87 from diarrhœa (a decline of 67, and being 96 below the average). Different forms of violence caused 48 deaths; 39 were the result of negligence or accident, of which 9 were caused by drowning. There were 2,356 births registered, a decline of 113, and exceeding the average by 64. The duration of sunshine was 37·7 hours out of the 92·6 hours that the sun was above the horizon, and the mean temperature was 53°·5, or 5°·2 below the average.

Miscellaneous.——The New Town Hall of Manchester, erected at a cost of 800,000*l.*, is to be opened to-day (Saturday). The Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Bright, and the Bishop of the diocese have accepted invitations.—The Social Science Congress commences its sittings at Aberdeen on Wednesday next, when the Earl of Aberdeen will deliver his inaugural address.—A Fine Art Exhibition, supplemented by a valuable loan from South Kensington, was opened on Monday at Penzance.—An important use has already been found for the Telephone. Some experiments have just been made in a Cornish mine, and it is found that by the aid of the instrument communication can easily be carried on between those above and below ground.—Thanks to the precautions taken by some of the local authorities, the high tide in the Thames has come and gone without doing so much damage as that of last year. There were, however, overflows in various places, which distinctly show the necessity for a more complete provision against the danger, especially when we take into account the fact that, owing to the absence of wind, the tide did not rise so high as was expected.—A mutiny is reported from the Curragh Camp. It seems that a number of extra drills and parades have recently been imposed upon the men of the 19th Hussars, some of whom deliberately marched out of camp on Saturday, instead of attending a foot parade. Infantry picquets and police were sent after them, and they returned quietly, and seventy-five men, who have been placed under arrest, will probably be tried by court martial.—A stray torpedo was picked up on Tuesday in Portsmouth Harbour, where it had lain long enough to get rusty. It was taken to the Vernon torpedo ship, the officers of which knew nothing about it.—On Tuesday an engine driver in the employ of the Great Western Railway Company was killed by the explosion of a boiler of the locomotive which had just reached the Shrewsbury station with a train. The stoker also was very dangerously injured.—A determined attempt to upset a train on the Great Northern line was made on Friday near Bawtry, where a piece of timber was placed across the rails, and fastened with screws ten inches long driven into the ballast. Fortunately the obstruction was discovered before any accident resulted.—News comes from Greenock that the sea serpent is in the Channel of Clyde doing great damage to the fishing nets. Several glimpses of the monster have been obtained by some fortunate excursionists on board Lord Glasgow's screw yacht Valetta.—On Wednesday last the Mansion House Indian Famine Fund had reached the sum of 145,000*l.*, of which 115,000*l.* had been sent to Madras.—The names of Louisa Catherine Fanny Atkins, of St. John's Wood; Sophia Jex Blake, of Bernard Street; Eliza Louisa Walker Dunbar, Clifton, Bristol; and Frances Elizabeth Hoggan, of Rutland Gate, have been added to the Medical Register, and those of some other lady doctors, it is stated, will soon follow.



SPORTING

The Turf.—A tame Doncaster week is a thing unknown. Other meetings may fluctuate, but that on the historic Town Moor always maintains the high standard it reached generations ago. It is the best example produced of our national sport, and stands out from all other gatherings, those at Newmarket not even excepted, as affording the best illustration of high class racing. Comparisons have been made scores of times between it and the gatherings at Epsom, Ascot, and Goodwood. Each have their distinctive features, but in all except that at Doncaster there is a very considerable holiday element, and the fair sex play a special part in them. Not so at Doncaster. The meeting does not attract many ladies, and mere holiday-makers are at a discount. It is a serious business; and the Yorkshire "tykes," who to a man love racehorses, and are good judges of racing, resent anything like levity in connection with their honoured reunion. Hence racing pure and simple is the order of the day, combined with critical inspection of the horses at their morning gallops, and attending the yearling sales before the racing commences. The weather has not been all that could be desired for the occasion, the opening day especially being miserably wet and cold. The rain made the course very holding in places, and hence, probably, the upsetting of many favourites on the Tuesday. The Fitzwilliam Stakes—weight for age—as usual opened the ball, and for this Trappist was made favourite; but he was beaten easily enough by Lord Lascelles's Mousquetaire, who carried within one pound of Captain Prime's horse. If other proof were wanting, this performance shows that Mousquetaire, had he been started, could have taken the Stewards' Cup at Goodwood with at least half a stone more on his back than he had been handicapped for. Some of his Goodwood supporters who saw him cut down his opponents on Tuesday, like Thomson's young lovers, "looked unutterable things." A very respectable field of thirteen contested the Great Yorkshire Handicap; and here again the backers were at fault, for Hilarious and Mrs. Pond, the two first favourites, had to put up with second and third places, Albert Edward taking the first, and thus showing that the estimate long ago formed of him was not far from the truth. But still worse luck was in store for "the talent" in the Champagne Stakes for two-year-olds. As only six animals composed the field, and Childeric's recent performances made him out to be the best two-year-old of the season, there was ample justification, as far as Turf wagering goes, for laying 2 to 1 on Lord Falmouth's colt; but he could not get even with the first three, being hopelessly beaten in the heavy ground some way from home. The winner, Count Lagrange's Clementine, had hitherto shown to disadvantage this year, and as much as 10 to 1 was procurable against her. It can hardly be supposed that the Champagne running will not be reversed before long. On the Leger Day large fields contested several of the stakes, and backers of favourites had again cause for lamentation, except in reference to the great race itself. The St. Leger on Wednesday entered into its second century, having been established in 1776, and few previous anniversaries have contained greater elements of interest. Lord Falmouth's pair, Silvio, the Derby winner, and Lady Golightly, were to antagonise each other. Plunger, a better animal than Silvio last autumn, was pronounced sound and perfectly trained. An illustrious foreigner in Fontainebleau had come to try conclusions with the pick of our three-year-olds, and his party was more than confident; while Brown Prince, the American colt, who ran well in the Two Thousand, was in the sport to carry the great Northern prize across the "herring pond." Thus the contest assumed an international character; and had a foreigner been successful, thousands of lusty lungs would have cheered the victory. As it was, the English horses fully maintained our equine prestige. The story of the race is soon told. Plunger was the animal most conspicuous in the race for the greater part of the journey, but her bolt was shot two furlongs from home, when Manœuvre, who had also been in front all the journey, assumed the lead. But Lord Falmouth's pair soon challenged Lord Bradford's filly, and Silvio, who evidently had the race in hand some distance from home, came away easily enough, and won by three lengths, her stable companion beating Manœuvre by a head. Strachino, a foreigner, was fifth, but the other strangers above mentioned were nowhere, or, to speak more definitely, tenth and eleventh. Lord Falmouth has thus won his first Leger; and if only the positions of his two animals had been reversed, he would have followed Mr. Merry's suite, who, in 1873 ran first and second with Marie Stuart and Doncaster. It may be remembered that in 1870 Lord Falmouth's Derby winner Kingcraft could only get second, and was followed home by his lordship's filly Wheatear.—The acceptances for the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire gave rise to considerable "fancy" speculation at Doncaster. The former race has 68 subscribers, while for the latter 70 out of the 185 subscribers have paid forfeit.

Cricket is not yet quite played out for the season. At Huddersfield the Professionals of the North have beaten the Gentlemen (with three professionals); but it must be noted that in the second innings no less than four Gentlemen absconded.—The Yorkshire Gentlemen made short work of Durham County at Darlington, beating their antagonists by an innings and 65 runs.—A match between a miscellaneous eleven, with a strong Surrey element in it, and Twenty-two members of the Vincent Square Clubs, drew a large number of persons together in the green square frequented by the Westminster boys. In the first innings the Twenty-two made 79, and the Eleven, with two wickets to spare, 92—and this decided the game, in which, it may be noted, that G. Hearne, sen., for the Eleven, took twelve wickets in 28 overs (five balls to the over), at a cost of only 26 runs.—Cricketers far and wide will regret to hear that the "champion" W. G. Grace has met with an accident when shooting on Monday last. He was hit about the face and eyes; but there is a good hope that his sight will not be impaired.

Coursing.——The public season opened with the Avebury Meeting on Tuesday last, but the backwardness of the harvest and the unfavourable weather militated against success. The former impediment will probably interfere with some other meetings. A good season is anticipated, as hares are reported as very plentiful, the entries for the chief stakes at the great meetings are above the average, and there were never so many good dogs in the country as at the present time.

Pedestrianism.——Gale is still walking strong at Lillie Bridge, and seems likely to do the 1,500 miles in the 1,000 hours, and thus eclipse Captain Barclay's feat of 1,000.

Swimming.—Swimmers seem to be attracting revived attention just now. Jones of Leeds has again beaten J. B. Johnson for the Championship, and the Cup now becomes his own property; J. B., however, received consolation by winning the 500 Yards Championship at the Wenlock Baths.—F. Cavill, naturally enough, does not like the hints thrown out as to the genuineness of his recent great swim, and is anxious to make a match with Captain Webb to swim the Channel.

Monsieur Zola's much-talked of novel, "L'Assommoir," is to be dramatised by M. Busnach.

A Daughter of the late Nathaniel Hawthorne, Miss Una Hawthorne, herself an authoress, died on Monday at Clewer.

The Excavations at Nineveh have at length been authorised by the Sultan, who has given the necessary firman to Mr. Layard.

Big Ben began work again on Friday night, although the striking apparatus would not be in working order until the middle of this week.

The Story of the "Arabian Nights" has been translated into Bengalee, and is being printed by natives. The edition will be in eight volumes, and will be the longest work ever issued by the native press.

Turquoise Rings are much worn by the Russian officers, declares a war correspondent of the Paris Figaro, as a talisman against danger, the turquoise being supposed to preserve the wearer from a violent death.

The Early Marriages in India are being much discouraged in the Bombay Presidency, and Government is to be petitioned to fix 20 as the minimum age at which young men may marry.

The first Belgian Expedition to explore Central Africa sent by the International Association will start for Natal on the 18th prox. After making their arrangements at Natal the expedition will go on to Zanzibar and to Lake Tanganyika, and from thence will journey into the interior to establish the first station.

A Number of Arctic Relics have been presented to the Royal Artillery Institution, Woolwich, by Captain Feilden, who accompanied the recent Polar Expedition as naturalist. The collection contains reindeer skulls and antlers, a Greenlander's harpoon, and a pair of snowshoes which belonged to the late Dr. Rae.

Marat's private Collection of his own Writings, classified by himself, and bearing annotations in his own handwriting, will shortly be sold in Paris. There are twelve volumes which were given by Mdlle. Albertine Marat to M. Vuillaume, the historian, from whom they have come into the possession of Prince Jérome Napoleon, their present owner.

Royal Asylum of St. Anne's Society Schools.——From the lists which have just been issued by the delegates of the University of Oxford, it will be seen that no less than fifty-one candidates from these schools have passed the examination. Of those successful there are three senior girls and thirteen senior boys; six junior girls and nineteen junior boys.

A Falstaffian Feast was recently held across the Atlantic, when the fat men of the United States met together for their annual dinner at Gregory's Point, Norwalk, Connecticut. The society boasted 467 members, of whom 291 were of the 200 lbs. standard weight or upwards. A New York reporter weighed 288 lbs.; but the palm was awarded to a young man of twenty-five, who attained 399 lbs.

Romeo and Juliet are again to figure on the stage, this time in a French opera, Les Amants de Vérone, by the Marquis d'Ivry, which is to be played this winter at the Paris Lyrique. Twelve composers have already set the Shakespearian libretto, beginning with Benda in 1772, and ending with Gounod in 1867; but not one of the operas has been a lasting success. Will the unfortunate "thirteenth" belie its character?

Monsieur Thiers is said to have left various posthumous works, which are to be published under the editorship of MM. Mignet, and Barthélemy St. Hilaire. Amongst other works there are his personal memoirs, on which he has been engaged for years, a treatise on the distinction between Grecian and Roman art, a portion of a history of the Renaissance, and his long-looked for work on polemic and religious philosophy in which, on the authority of history, he refutes the doctrines of Darwin, Comte, Littré, Renan, and Spinoza, and which, it is said, is to afford a final answer to those who have termed him a "free-thinker, or at least a Voltairian."

The Wholesale Destruction of Game in India has reached such a pitch that many districts are now perfectly barren of sport. The Cawnpore district, hitherto famous for pig-sticking and black-buck shooting, has been so cleared that there is hardly an antelope to be seen within miles of the station. In one regiment the soldiers are allowed to go out shooting in gangs, and as the failure of the crops has robbed the deer of any shelter, and the animals are also suffering from heat and want of water, they are easily surrounded and shot down in herds. The villagers, too, are allowed to carry arms to frighten the birds from their crops, and are thus tempted to poach.

A fatal Alpine Accident occurred last Thursday, near Zermatt. Two London barristers, Messrs. W. A. Lewis and N. Paterson, with three guides, the brothers Knubel, ascended the Lyskamm, and as they did not return a search party was despatched next morning, when the bodies of the unfortunate travellers were found at the bottom of a precipice, where they had evidently been thrown by the giving way of an overhanging ledge of snow. Death must have been instantaneous. The bodies were recovered, and were buried at Zermatt on Monday. Anent mountain disasters, the body of Mr. W. W. Barry, who was lost in the snow whilst on a tour in the Austrian Tyrol, in 1875, has just been found on the Krimmler Tauern. It was in a sitting posture, death having evidently resulted from exhaustion, and was discovered by a shepherd on the highest point of the mountain. In No. 368, Dec. 16, 1876, we gave an illustration of the Krimler Ache Waterfalls, near which he was lost.

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The attack upon Plevna has at length been begun, and while displaying far more caution than formerly, and evincing none of that rashness to which their recent disastrous defeat was mainly due, the Russians have spared no efforts to make the battle a "Turkish Sedan," by not only attempting to gain possession of Plevna, but to completely surround Osman Pasha and his army. Instead of waiting for the Imperial Guard, as at first intended, the Grand Duke Nicholas determined immediately to resume the contest, aided by his Roumanian allies, his decision probably being hastened by the successful advance of the Turks along the Lom, where the Czarevitch has been forced back upon the Jantra by Mehemet Ali. If promptitude and unanimity had characterised the Turkish commanders, if Mehemet Ali had hurried forward to Sistova, and if Suleiman had rejoined his colleagues instead of lurking in the Balkans, the Russians would have found considerable difficulty in dealing with Osman Pasha, but, as usual, Turkish official sluggishness has proved the best ally of the Muscovites.

The struggle round Plevna was virtually opened by the capture of Loftcha, last week, and which cost the victors 1,000 men, the loss of the Turks exceeding 2,200. On Wednesday week the Grand Duke Nicholas pushed forward his headquarters to Radenica, between Bulgareni and Poredin, Prince Charles of Roumania was posted at Verbitza, to the east of Plevna, while the Loftcha force guarded the southern approach. Next day the Russians, unobserved by the Turks, brought up heavy siege guns, which were placed in position during the night, so that early on Friday morning a vigorous bombardment was begun, the Czar himself being on the field. The Russian forces amounted to 80,000 men—of whom 32,000 were Roumanians—and 356 guns, while Osman Pasha had at most 60,000 men and 220 guns. Heavy firing continued all day, and was resumed on Saturday, when the Russians secured the heights to the south of the town, and occupied the village of Uschitza. On Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday the bombardment continued, and the assailants gradually and cautiously closed in round Plevna, General Skobeloff, the hero of Lovatz, capturing another height on Monday. The Roumanian troops have behaved with great bravery, and have been highly complimented and bountifully decorated by the Czar.

On the Lom the Czarevitch is by no means so successful as his uncle Nicholas. The Rustchuk garrison having made a sortie to Kadikoi, to divert the Czarevitch's attention, the Turks under Ahmed Eyoub on Wednesday week attacked Kuzelevo and Oblava, and at the former village forced the Russians across the Lom. They were repulsed at Oblava, but the Russians found the position untenable, and next day fell back on Banicka, whence on Friday they further retreated to Biela. Here the division from Metchka shortly arrived, and the Czarevitch also came from Koprivca, and made his headquarters at Biela, finding it necessary to concentrate his troops and abandon his tactics of weak extended lines. It is reported that the bridge at Pyrgos has fallen into the hands of the Turks, whose outposts would thus be in dangerous proximity to the Czarevitch and the main communications at Sistova, but a telegram from Bucharest asserts that the Russians removed the bridge to Petroscan, higher up the river. According to a Turkish source Nedjib Pasha gained a victory on Saturday at Popkoi, while Mehemet Ali was reported to be fortifying the line of the Black Lom, and to be advancing on Biela, where the Czarevitch, having evacuated the positions on the Lom, is preparing for a decisive battle. Mehemet Ali is now in a position to strike a vigorous blow, and by prompt action might speedily be able to come to the assistance of Osman Pasha, but his recent energy has apparently exhausted him, and he does not seem to have followed up his advantage. Suleiman's help is sorely needed just now, and reports are abroad of his unwillingness to join Mehemet Ali, lest he should be thrown into the background. This clearly proves the mistaken policy of promising the post of Commander-in-Chief to the most distinguished general, thus instigating each commander to independent action. Suleiman may yet, however, sink ambition in patriotism, and rumour states that he has crossed the Balkans by the Triavna Pass. All is quiet in the Shipka Pass, where, by the bye, the Turks have sacrificed 12,000 lives. The bombardment of Rustchuk continues at intervals, and an unsuccessful sortie was made last week from Widdin, where the garrison has been increased to 8,000 men, and which on Wednesday, was being vigorously bombarded by the Kalafat batteries. The Russian Imperial Guard are now passing through Bucharest at the rate of 4,000 men per diem, and may speedily be expected on the field, while General Gourko, who has been resting at Bucharest, is said to have left to rejoin the Emperor. Meanwhile General Zimmerman and his Dobrudscha force remain apparently doing nothing, although they may perhaps be moving on the Sulina mouth of the Danube, where the Russians are threatening an attack, and where Hobart Pasha and his squadron have arrived to defend the place.

In ASIA, the cold weather will probably soon prevent active operations, and both armies are preparing their winter quarters. Siege guns from Alexandropol are, however, being brought up to the Russian camp at Kuruk Dara, a skirmish took place on Friday at Kizil Tepe with no decided result, a murderous raid of Turkish irregulars has been made on Armenians at Gulvedscha, and a minor engagement has occurred near Batoum.—The Turks in MONTENEGRO have suffered a serious reverse, Nicksics having surrendered unconditionally. The fortress had suffered considerably from the bombardment, and, the ammunition growing short, the populace refused to fight, so that on Saturday the garrison surrendered, and was allowed to march out with its arms and retire to Gatzko, Prince Nikita not wishing to feed a large number of prisoners. The Montenegrins have thus secured a fine battery of 12-pounders and plenty of provisions, while the capture of the fortress, which has been besieged by them at least five times previously, is one of the greatest events in their history. The inhabitants and their victors fraternised heartily. The whole Turkish loss during the siege was 200 men.

Such is a brief chronicle of the week's fighting, from which it will be seen that a great and decisive battle may be now daily expected, the result of which will not only affect the combatants, but will also have powerful influence upon those idle waiters of the campaign, Greece and Servia. If the Russians are successful there is little doubt but that both these States will join the Russians and declare war—indeed it is said that Servia has only been restrained from joining the conflict by the councils of England. These, however, are being rapidly outweighed by the urgent advice of Russia, to which Prince Milan is represented as lending an only too willing ear. The Servian people as a whole greatly dislike the notion of another war, but their ruler and his Government are anxious to wipe out the memory of their disgrace last year, and to follow the example of the Roumanians by sending a contingent to the Russian army, which will afford them some claim to consideration in the grand settlement which is expected to take place at the end of the campaign—when the Russians shall have completely discomfited the Turks, and compelled them to cry "Hold, enough."—In ROUMANIA Prince Charles has issued a manifesto—a species of apology to Europe for attacking his suzerain. Touching upon the unexpected protraction of the war, he draws a vivid picture of what would happen in Roumania if the Turks were to cross the Danube. It is the "feeling of self-preservation and not the desire of conquest which draws us from the defensive," he cries, but he does not forget to wind up by reminding his people that the flag he raises bears the inscription, "Independence of the State of Roumania."

At CONSTANTINOPLE the trial of Abd-ul-Kerim and Redif Pashas has been postponed until the end of the war, owing, it is said, to the still powerful influence of Mahmoud Damad Pasha, and the determination to fight out the war to the end has been in no way lessened by the recent reverses in the Shipka Pass and before Plevna, while the Sultan is stated to have been completely gained over to the party who wish to secure the complete independence of Turkey by freeing her from the tutelage of Europe. Nevertheless, Europe does not appear in the least inclined to abandon that privilege which she has now so long enjoyed, and during the past week there have been endless rumours about mediation, in which England and Germany appear ultimately as the prime movers. Notwithstanding the continual contradiction of these reports, they probably have some foundation of truth, and it is expected that after the next great battle some steps towards a pacific solution of the whole question may be taken by one or other of the great Powers.

FRANCE.——The funeral of M. Thiers on Saturday is described and commented upon in another column, so we need not here say more than that while the most intense sympathy was shown by the whole population, no political demonstration was attempted, the slightest tendency towards any species of manifestation being promptly checked by the Republican leaders. Universal sympathy continues to be manifested with Madame Thiers, and amongst others Queen Victoria has sent her a letter of condolence. As for the effect of M. Thiers' death upon the political situation in France, it is yet too early to judge. The Monarchical organs are loud in their assertions that Conservative Republicanism has died with the ex-Premier, while the Republicans exhort their party to follow out his principles, and to remember that if dead in the flesh, in the spirit "Petit Bonhomme vit encore." They point with pardonable pride that the peaceful manner in which the funeral was carried out is an answer to the arguments of their adversaries that now M. Thiers is gone there will be no limit to Radical excesses, and while the Conservative Press indulges in pæans of triumph upon the removal of the chief prop of Republicanism, and such extremists as MM. Veuillot and Paul de Cassagnac give vent to the most abusive language with regard to the ex-President, the Republican journals are strikingly calm, moderate, and confident. Thus it is scarcely likely that the great mass of the bourgeoisie will abandon the Republican cause during the coming electoral struggle, as many of the Conservatives joyfully prophecy; if anything, the arrogant language of the latter, when compared with the studied moderation of the former, will only strengthen their determination to send a Republican majority to Versailles.

That the Marshal himself is not unaware of this feeling has been manifested by the very modified tone of his speech at Bordeaux, which he visited on Monday and Tuesday on his way from the Château of the Duc Decazes to Arcachon. At Bordeaux he has received a very warm welcome, but in every case the cry of "Vive le Président!" or "Vive le Maréchal!" has been accompanied by "Vive la République!" the worthy Bordelais being bent upon showing that their greeting was accorded not so much to Marshal MacMahon individually as to the President of the established Republic. The same spirit pervaded the Maire's speech, who welcomed the Marshal in "the name of the great Republican city which in 1870 became the seat of government," and stated that the municipal councillors who accompanied him were the "elect of a population, Republican—that is to say, laborious, firmly attached to order, and respectful to the law." He concluded by expressing his confidence that Universal Suffrage having spoken, the Constitution will have acquired a fresh guarantee "in the word of an honest man—yours, M. le President—that of a loyal soldier gloriously made Marshal of France." To this the Marshal replied by complimenting the city by expressing an assurance that "Peace, the first of your needs, will not be disturbed;" and that "when the country shall have answered my appeal, the Constitution to which you are attached, and of which I will be the faithful guardian, will work without obstruction." Other noteworthy speeches were made by the Presidents of the Council General and of the Chamber of Commerce on the importance of free trade, which the Marshal fully acknowledged in a few words, stating that the prosperous state of the finances afforded a hope for the reduction of taxes in the next Budget. From Bordeaux the Marshal on Wednesday went to Perigueux.

On the whole, the Marshal's visit to Bordeaux (of which the details, as they resemble those of all other visits to a provincial capital by the Chief of the State, we need not recount) has been a success, and his words will go far to calm the alarm which has been excited as to the Marshal's post-electoral intentions; but this good impression has been considerably qualified by the result of the prosecution of M. Gambetta. The trial had been fixed for Tuesday; but on that day M. Gambetta did not appear, and applied for an adjournment on the plea of his counsel's ill-health. This was refused, and judgment was pronounced by default in a lengthy sentence, which bears more the character of a political manifesto than of a judicial decision. M. Gambetta and M. Murat were found guilty of writing and publishing "insults" on the President and "outrages" on his Ministers—the insult reaching its "highest degree of gravity" in the now famous assertion that if France gave her verdict against the Marshal he "must submit or resign." Accordingly, M. Murat and his "accomplice," M. Gambetta, are each condemned to three months' imprisonment and 80*l.* fine. Of course they will appeal, and then will come the real hearing of the case, though it is highly doubtful whether the result will be different.

The autumn season at Paris began on Monday with the first races in the Bois de Boulogne; but there is little other "gossip" beyond a first representation of a five-act melodrama at the Théâtre Historique, Le Régiment de Champagne, by M. Jules Claretie. There has been a disastrous fire at Dieppe, where extensive saw-mills and five houses were destroyed, the damage amounting to 40,000*l.*

ITALY.——The Pope's health is said to be better, but there is evidently considerable anxiety abroad concerning his state, and Cardinal Simeoni, who has been asked by various Governments as to the true state of the case, has instructed the Nuncios to assure the Governments to which they are accredited that the moment there is any positive grounds for alarm the intelligence will be at once imparted to them, without regard for political considerations. All the cardinals abroad have been requested to visit Rome next winter to give their opinion on the arrangements for "future events."

UNITED STATES.——President Hayes is making a tour through the Western and Southern States, and on Saturday was warmly welcomed at Marietta, Ohio, by an enthusiastic assemblage of 15,000 persons; thence he went on to Dayton.—The Republican candidates have again been successful in Wisconsin and Maine, in the latter State, however, the party majority has decreased by 7,000.—Yellow fever has broken out at Fernandina, Florida.—On Saturday, the day of M. Thiers' funeral, the National flag at Washington was hoisted half-mast high, out of respect to the late ex-President of France.—The Mormon Elders have nominated John Taylor, the Senior Elder, as acting President until an election can be held.—Admiral Semmes of the famous Alabama, is dead.

INDIA.——Rain has fallen copiously in Madras, and the weather reports for last week are decidedly more hopeful. In Bombay, Hyderabad, Mysore, and the North-Western Provinces there has also been rain, and although in the last named district the situation is still critical the general prospects throughout the country have improved. The Government is as busy as ever organising the relief meaures, and the Viceroy has explained his opinion with respect to private subscriptions, stating that while it is undesirable for the Government to ask for funds from those who hereafter will have to bear the burden of the taxation, every encouragement should be given to any spontaneous efforts which may be made in that direction. The crisis, it is now expected, will be over in four months.

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice are visiting Ross-shire this week. Her Majesty and the Princess left Balmoral on Wednesday for Loch Maree, where a hotel on the shore has been secured for the Royal party, and after some days' stay the Queen will probably take a trip to the Isle of Skye. Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice last week drove to the Glassalt Shiel, called on Mrs. Campbell, and on Saturday visited Glen Gelder Shiel. On Sunday service was held at the Castle, the Rev. Dr. Donald M'Leod officiating, and in the evening Mr. Hardy, the Rev. Dr. M'Leod, and the Rev. A. Campbell dined with the Queen. Her Majesty has also entertained Mr. and Mrs. Hutchings and Mr. George Farquharson of Invercauld.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and their children remain at Cowes in the Osborne, the Prince having returned from France in the Hildegarde at the end of last week. On Monday afternoon the Prince and Princess with the ex-Empress Eugénie and Prince Louis Napoleon sailed round the island. Next week the Prince will visit Sir George Wombwell at Newburgh Park Yorkshire. He will arrive on Monday, and will shoot over the estate.—Princes Albert Victor and George were to have joined the Britannia to day (Saturday), as the term began on Monday, but their arrival has been postponed till the elder Prince is quite restored to health.

Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne go on Wednesday next to Isell Park, to stay with Mr. and Mrs. Wyndham. Next day the Princess will visit Carlisle to open the Bazaar in aid of the Infirmary, and on the following Monday the Princess and her husband are expected at Muncaster Castle.—The Duke of Connaught has returned to London from Killarney, and on Wednesday went to the Gaiety Theatre.—Prince Leopold was expected to-day to stay with the Earl and Countess of Breadalbane at Taymouth Castle, but his visit was postponed. Great preparations had been made for his reception, triumphal arches had been erected, and an address prepared.

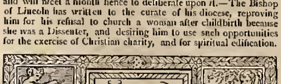
The Emperor and Empress of Brazil have left Europe on their return to their own country after an absence of eighteen months. They left Lisbon in the Orénoque on Sunday for Rio Janeiro, the vessels in the Tagus firing farewell salutes.—The ex-Empress Eugénie and Prince Louis Napoleon on Monday attended a special service at Cowes held in memory of Napoleon III.—The ex-Queen Isabella of Spain was to return to Paris this week for the winter. King Alphonso bade her adieu at the Escurial on Tuesday.

CHURCH NEWS

A NEW CLERICAL ORDER.——A curious and lengthy document has just been issued by the "Order of Corporate Reunion." It is headed with the motto "Pro Deo, pro Ecclesia, pro Patria," and bears the names of Thomas, by favour of God, Rector of the Order, and Pro-Provincial of Canterbury; Joseph, by favour of God, Provincial of York; and Laurence, by favour of God, Provincial of Caerleon, who with "the provosts and members of the Synod of the Order," addressing the "faithful in Christ Jesus," begin by pointing out the "state of degradation and confusion which has overtaken the Established Church." Then comes a lengthy historic sketch of the Church of England from the time of St. Augustine until now, followed by a formal and solemn protest, "in the name of the Living and True God," against all and every intrusion and interference of the Civil Power in Spiritual things, whether past or present; and another against the "anti-Christian character of Board Schools." The authors of the "Pastoral" then declare that they desire to avoid all violence, schism, and disobedience to Constituted Authority in things secular; regarding it as their duty rather to support and restore, as Almighty God may permit, the ancient constitution of their country in Church and State, than to co-operate in any rash and dangerous work of demolition and destruction "the consequences and end of which none can foresee." They express their frank and unreserved acceptance of the Faith and Teaching of the Undivided Church, and appeal to a free General Council to bring about Corporate Reunion. They then go on to describe how the Order has been founded and the conditions of membership, and the latter part of the address consists of a number of paragraphs referring to Dissent, Monasticism, Secular Courts, Convocation, and other subjects. The document bears but one signature, that of "The Right Rev. Adrian de Helte," who testifies that it is "a true copy of the original. Drawn up, approved, ratified, confirmed, and solemnly promulgated, in the divinely-protected City of London (which God pardon for its sins, and still mercifully protect), on the 8th of September, being the Feast of the Nativity of Our Lady Saint Mary, the Blessed Mother of God, in the year of our Lord and of the World's Redemption, 1877."

THE JEWISH YEAR.——Last Saturday, the first day of the Jewish New Year, was observed as a Holy Convocation, and next Monday, the "Day of Atonement," will be a strict fast day. Three other sacred days will quickly follow—viz., the "Feast of Tabernacles" on the 22nd, the festival of the "Eighth Day of Solemn Assembly" on the 29th, and the "Rejoicing of the Law" on the 30th. The Civil Year, which began on Monday last, with the first year of the seventh month, is A.M. 5638. It is the fourteenth year of the 297th lunar cycle, and therefore it will be a leap year of 385 days, 55 weeks, or 13 months. The Jewish year is commonly composed of 12 lunar months, consisting of 29 or 30 days each, and is adapted from time to time to the course of the solar year by the use, not of intercalary days, as in the Gregorian calendar, but by the more ancient device of intercalary months.

VARIOUS.——The Tablet referring to Dr. Thorold's correspondence with Mr. Grant says that the Bishop has administered a knockdown blow to the non-Protestant members of his flock, or rather to those who imagine themselves not to be Protestants, and that his lordship's letter is "merely an explosion of common sense, which is revolted at seeing people who shrink in horror from the name of Protestant continuing to adhure to such a thoroughly 'protesting' and anti-catholic communion" as the Church of England.—The Rev. Arthur Tooth has resigned the vicarage of St. James's, Hatcham, and it is said that he has just received a legacy of 10,000*l.*, with which he intends to set up a Proprietary Chapel and Orphanage at Croydon, near the residence of the Primate.—The Glasgow United Presbyterian Presbytery seem to have caught a Tartar in the new heretic, the Rev. Fergus Ferguson, who being invited to answer questions as to his soundness of faith, has turned upon his accusers with a bold impeachment of the Confession itself, affirming that it is heretical, inasmuch as it is not in harmony with the Divine Order of the Universe, and is an exhibition to some extent of the disorder of the human intellect. The Presbytery are reported to have considered the speech unsatisfactory, but they have ordered it to be printed, and will meet a month hence to deliberate upon it.—The Bishop of Lincoln has written to the curate of his diocese, reproving him for his refusal to church a woman after childbirth because she was a Dissenter, and desiring him to use such opportunities for the exercise of Christian charity, and for spiritual edification.



MUSIC

GLOUCESTER FESTIVAL.——The 154th meeting of the Three Choirs of Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester, held last week in the first-named city, was a success that surpassed expectation—a triumph, in short, gained for a worthy cause. The reasons that led to an unexampled manifestation on the part of the Gloucester people, the large majority of whom uncompromisingly uphold the Festival, are familiar to our readers, who are not likely to have forgotten the turmoil created two years ago, in the city of Worcester, by the Dean and Chapter's refusal to allow the use of the Cathedral for oratorios, and the substitution of a series of lengthy Church services for the music of Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn. Nor can they have forgotten the stand made by Hereford, in 1876, when the Mayors and Corporations of Gloucester and Worcester accepted an invitation from the Mayor of Hereford, to co-operate and sympathise; for Worcester is not a bit less disposed to maintain the Festivals as long established than its sister towns. The success of the 153rd meeting of the Choirs—thanks to the determined resolution of clergy no less than of laity, added to the indefatigable exertions of the late regretted Mr. Townshend Smith, organist of the Cathedral, and conductor of the Festivals—was an emphatic proof of how little the scruples of the Worcester Dean and Chapter were shared by the clerical authorities of Hereford. It was, in fact, a protest of marked significance. All eyes were then turned towards Gloucester; because if the Dean and Chapter followed in the footsteps of their brethren at Worcester and forbade the use of the Cathedral for oratorios, there must inevitably be an end of the Gloucester meetings, and unless Hereford could stand alone, which was out of all likelihood, an end of the Three Choir gatherings altogether. The forebodings were the gloomier, inasmuch as the Bishop of the Diocese, since his appointment, had never given any encouragement to the Festivals, invariably choosing the period of their occurrence for his annual trip to Switzerland. This was avowed by Bishop Ellicott himself, in his gracious speech at the Mayor's lunch, during which he good-naturedly alluded to the fact of his having been christened, by some facetious writer, "the episcopal mountaineer." The death of that eminent musician, Dr. S. S. Wesley, who, in his capacity of cathedral organist, was also conductor of the Festivals, which he stoutly advocated on all occasions, would, according to the opinion of many, place another obstacle in the way—the more so as very little was known about his successor, Mr. Charles Harford Lloyd. Nevertheless, as time flew on, matters gradually brightened up. Not only was the use of the Cathedral granted, but the Bishop cheerfully consented to deliver the sermon for the widows and orphans. The main difficulties being thus overcome, preliminary arrangements were sufficiently easy, the programme ultimately decided upon showing that Mr. Harford Lloyd, the new conductor, was thoroughly competent for the task devolving on him. Nothing, under the circumstances, could have been in better taste than his selection of music, the preponderance of "sacred" over "secular" being marked. Instead of three miscellaneous concerts at the Shire Hall "for the operatic singing birds" (to quote Richard Wagner), there were only two, a "a special free service" in the nave of the church, with full chorus and orchestra, being substituted for the third. Some 3,000 persons assisted at this service; and the music, by Dr. Wesley, Dr. Goss, Mr. Henry Gadsby, Purcell, and Handel, allowing for a few shortcomings in the execution, was all that could be desired. There was no sermon; but the Bishop himself pronounced the blessing. A choral service, with organ accompaniment only, preceded the oratorio on the opening day. At this, as at the services on the three following mornings, Mr. S. G. Hayward was organist, and the music was judiciously chosen from Croft, Ouseley, Hopkins, Boyce, Greene, Mendelssohn, and Wesley—due respect being paid, as was but just, to the last named illustrious English composer. With the general programme of the week our readers have been made acquainted; a mere recapitulation will therefore suffice. On Tuesday Mendelssohn's Elijah took up the entire afternoon. On Wednesday a lengthy selection from J. S. Bach's St. Matthew Passion, followed by Beethoven's Mount of Olives, according to the unwarrantable English version which the Sacred Harmonic Society first taught us not to admire, under the title of Engedi; in the evening the Cathedral was lighted up for a performance of the first part of Mendelssohn's St. Paul and the second part of Haydn's Creation. On Thursday there was a programme comprising various materials—Dr. Sullivan's overture, "In Memoriam," a "Kyrie Eleison" by Mr. B. Luard-Selby (from a projected Mass, it may be presumed), the "German Requiem" of Brahms, Gounod's sacred air, "There is a green hill" (which has very little of sacred in it), Dr. Wesley's most popular and well-known anthem, "The Wilderness," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." On Friday morning the imperishable Messiah was a matter of course; followed in the evening by the "Special Free Service" already referred to. Thus as against two performances in the Shire Hall we had six in the Cathedral. At the two secular concerts the features of consequence were a goodly selection from Schumann's Paradise and Peri, and Niels Gade's cantata, The Crusaders—which last by no means created an impression as lively as at the Birmingham Festival a year ago, when it was originally produced in England. Two new orchestral pieces were introduced—a "Concert Overture," in E flat, for orchestra, by Mr. Montague Smith, and a "Festival Overture," in B flat, written expressly for the occasion, by Mr. C. V. Stanford of Trinity College. The performance of each was directed by its composer; but though well constructed, sufficiently tuneful and scored for the instruments' excellent effect, neither overture offers any evident traits of original thought, and both may on that account be classed with the "Kyrie" of Mr. Luard-Selby. The one symphony included in the programmes was the familiar (somewhat too familiar) "C minor" of Beethoven, the remaining overtures being Wagner's almost used-up Tannhäuser and the Jubilee of Weber—which, placed at the end of the final concert, served appropriately enough for "God Save the Queen," its peroration being a brilliant setting forth of the same tune as that of our own National Anthem. Mendelssohn's concerto for violin, played by M. Sainton, and Weber's Concertstück for pianoforte, played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, were likewise features—welcome as always. Space for any description of the vocal exhibitions in detail is not available, nor is it called for. Mdlle. Albani, engaged to replace Mdlle. Titiens, proved a worthy substitute for that great artist. When it is added that the other leading singers were Madame Patey, our chief contralto; Miss Adela Vernon, a promising young soprano; Madame Sophie Löwe, Miss Bertha Griffiths, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Cummings, Maybrick, and Santley, enough has been said to show that very little was wanting in this essential department. The chorus and orchestra, nearly three hundred strong, were thoroughly up to the Gloucester mark; and the performances, in the majority of instances, were remarkably effective, those of the exceptionally difficult pieces—Bach's Passion and the Requiem of Brahm, for example—being among the most satisfactory of all. Mr. Lloyd may, therefore, be fairly complimented on his maiden essay, we believe, as orchestral conductor, and the inhabitants of Gloucester on a Festival the success of which has dispersed all fears, and promises to restore, with certain advisable modifications, the meetings of the choirs on their long-established basis.

WAIFS.——It is now generally known that Madame Adelina Patti has signed a new engagement with Mr. Gye for the season of 1878, so that it is to be hoped no more absurd rumours may be circulated to her disadvantage.—The grand Musical Festival at Leeds, with the programme of which our readers have been made acquainted, begins on Wednesday. High hopes are entertained of Professor Macfarren's new oratorio, Joseph.

LEGAL

A FIGHT WITH A BURGLAR.——Last Saturday, just before midnight, a house in the City Road occupied by Mr. Braham, a diamond merchant, was the scene of a very serious affray with burglars. One of Mr. Braham's sons, hearing a noise, went down stairs with a light, which was immediately blown out, and he was attacked by two men, with whom he struggled for some time, receiving severe wounds from a knife with which one of them was armed. His cries for help aroused his father, brother, and the maid-servant, and also caused a crowd of people to collect outside the house. Whether the thieves had any accomplices amongst these can only of course be guessed, but it seems that a false cry was raised that the police had arrived, and that on Mr. Braham opening the door the mob rushed into the passage shouting "Let the man go," the result being that in the mêlée both burglars escaped. One, however, who appears to have been badly wounded, left tracks of blood for some distance, and a young man who was admitted to St. Bartholomew's Hospital at 1.30 A.M. on Sunday morning was arrested on suspicion, and was on Monday positively identified by Mr. Braham's second son. He, however, declares his innocence, and accounts for his wounds by saying that, in a fit of drunken bravado, he jumped over a wall and fell a depth of some twenty-five feet upon a heap of loose bricks. It is also said that he has been in respectable employment as a printer for four years at least. Mr. Hosack, the Clerkenwell magistrate, however, declined either to hear the witnesses for the defence or to admit the accused to bail.

THE BLACKHEATH HIGHWAYMEN.——Two young men, aged respectively eighteen and nineteen, are now in custody on suspicion of being the perpetrators of the outrages which caused so much alarm at Blackheath in May last. They are bakers by trade, and have been working at Portsmouth, where they were arrested a few days ago on another charge of robbery. Their boxes were searched, and amongst the things found were two revolvers and many copies of the Young Briton, the Boys' Standard, Nightshade, and Claude Duval. It was also discovered that they had been in possession of two 5*l.* notes which formed part of the contents of the purse which Mr. Hodgson gave up to his assailants on Blackheath; and it has since been proved that at the time of the scare they, in company with a young woman, took lodgings at a house in Greenwich, which after a month's occupancy they left without notice, although they paid the rent. One of the notes seems to have been cashed in London and the other in Portsmouth, but as yet no distinct evidence respecting them has been given. The case was to come again before the Greenwich magistrate to-day (Saturday).

THE GREAT ROBBERY OF BONDS.——The two men suspected of being concerned in the theft of 70,000*l.* worth of foreign bonds while in transit from London to Paris were taken before Alderman Sir R. Carden on Friday, when it was announced that the Solicitor of the Treasury had been instructed to take the case in hand. Mr. B. Wontner, who defended Carr, objected to the magistrate's jurisdiction, arguing that as the theft was committed in France, and the Extradition Treaty did not apply to cases of larceny, both prisoners were entitled to be discharged without going into the merits of the case. Mr. G. Lewis, the prosecuting counsel, contended, on the other hand, that the offence was a "continuing larceny," and was completed the moment the thieves returned to this country; and the magistrate, declaring that all the arguments in the world would not induce him to discharge the prisoners, ordered another remand, refusing bail.

THE DETECTIVE CONSPIRACY.——A distinct step has at last been made in this case, Sir J. Ingham having committed Mr. Froggatt for trial, and declared his intention of doing the same by Meiklejohn and Druscovich, remarking that he proposed to keep Palmer's case entirely distinct. On Saturday a great sensation was created in court by the arrest of Chief Inspector Clarke, whose appearance in the dock so affected the other prisoners that Meiklejohn and Palmer shed tears, and Druscovich evidently had great difficulty in preserving an outward show of composure. An interesting item of evidence on Saturday was that which related to the salaries received by the accused detectives. Those of Clark, Palmer, and Druscovich were stated as 276*l.* a year each, whilst Meiklejohn's was 225*l.*, made up to 300*l.* by an allowance from the Midland Railway. A further remand has been ordered, and Froggatt, Palmer, and Clarke are all admitted to bail. Clarke's statement of his connection with the case, sent to the Treasury before his arrest, has been since published. In it he alleges that his intercourse with Benson (under the name of Yongo) was of a perfectly legitimate character, that he had some suspicion of him, and that he personally arrested Murray, the first man taken into custody on the de Goncourt charge, which initial step led to the apprehension and conviction of the rest. He denies the statements about his receiving bribes from Kurr and Benson, and says that they can only have been made from motives of revenge.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Coming Events says that Colonel Henderson has sent in his resignation of the office of Chief Commissioner of Police, but as yet he has merely received the ordinary official acknowledgement of his letter. According to the same authority Scotland Yard is flooded with applications—many from retired officers of both Services, for employment as "police agents."—Burglary with violence seems to be growing into fashion. Besides the City Road affair reported in another paragraph, two other cases have recently occurred. At Burntwood Hall, Barnsley, last week, a thief on being discovered in the house shammed insanity, striking and biting the people of the house, and declaring that he was an "elephant commander from another world." He kept up the rôle at the police court, but the magistrates were not to be deceived, and he was sent to prison for five months. The other case happened on Sunday night at Enfield, where a police-constable was brutally maltreated by two ruffians whom he met coming away from a house which they had robbed. Having told him that they lived there he had requested them to return with him, and they apparently consented, but struck him when off his guard with a "jemmy," and left him insensible on the road.—At Rochdale, a young man, who alleges that he was actuated by "insane impulse," has been committed for trial for turning out a signal light at an important junction on the Yorkshire and Lancashire Railway.—Sir H. Selwin Ibbetson was last Friday summoned as a juryman at the Inverness Circuit Court, but was excused from serving by the judges, who however declined to give any opinion as to whether his seat in Parliament or his position at the Home Office entitled him to exemption.—Some rioting has arisen out of the trade dispute at Burnley. The operatives having struck work last week, some new hands from Stockport were employed. On Monday these "knobsticks" were mobbed, and a policeman is said to have struck a woman with his truncheon. This exasperated the crowd, who set upon the officers and kicked them, and one had his head "bruised in with a brick."—A relieving officer of the parish of Clapham is in custody on a charge of embezzlement. During his absence on sick leave it was discovered that for about four months he had been drawing about 5*l.* per week by entering spurious and fictitious names on the relief list.

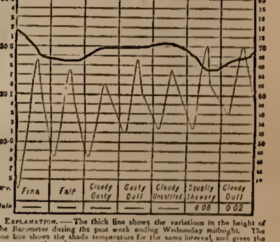
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

SEPTEMBER 6TH TO SEPTEMBER 12TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.——The thick line shows the variation in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——During this week the movement of the barometer has been very slight in London; but in the west and north of our islands a very considerable fall has occurred, and south westerly breezes have taken the place of the squally easterly winds which prevailed all over the country before Monday, the 10th instant. Temperature has risen as the change has occurred, and soft damp air is being experienced in lieu of the harsh easterly wind previously experienced. The barometer was highest (30·16 inches) early on the 6th instant; lowest (29·75 inches) on the 11th instant; range only 0·41 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (70°) on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 11th and 12th; lowest (41°) on Thursday, the 6th instant; range, 29°. Rainfall. Total fall, 0·10 inches, on two days. greatest fall, 0·08 inches, on Tuesday, the 11th instant.

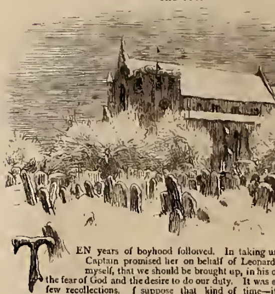
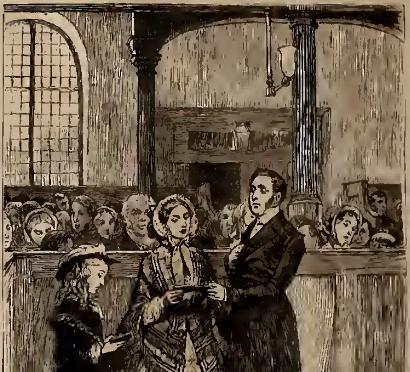
CHAPTER V.

THE YOUNG PRINCE



TEN years of boyhood followed. In taking us both away from Mrs. Jeram the Captain promised her on behalf of Leonard, and Wassielewski on behalf of myself, that we should be brought up, in his old-fashioned way of putting it, in the fear of God and the desire to do our duty. It was an uneventful time, which has left few recollections. I suppose that kind of time—it has been always mine—is the happiest which leaves the fewest memories. Yet its happiness for the want of contrast is not felt. Perhaps it is better not to be happy, and to lead the life of action and peril such as has been granted to Leonard and denied to me. When the time arrives to lie down and go to sleep it must be good to leave behind the memory of bygone great days big with issues dependent on your courage and self-possession. My life has but one episode, and because it is not likely to have another I have sat down to tell it. In the' end I am like any rustic on a farm, any secluded dweller on a remote island, inasmuch as one day has followed and will follow another, marked with no other change than from sunshine to rain, from summer to winter.



Celia and her parents in the square pew at St. Faith's Church.

Of course we were soon sent to school. The fact that I was a Pole, coupled with my deformity, produced in my favour the mingled feeling of respect and curiosity with hardly disguised contempt which boys always feel for a foreigner or a cripple. Of course, too, it immediately became known that we had been living in Victory Row, under the care of a charwoman. Contumely was the first result of the knowledge. Leonard, however, then about eleven, showed himself so handy with his fists—one consequence of his many combats with Moses—with a disregard of superior weight and strength as complete as any one of Nelson's captains might have shown—that any further reference to charwomen or accidents of birth had to be made with bated breath and went out of fashion in the school. New boys, it is true, were instigated, as if it was a joke, to ask Leonard for information as to the price of soap and the interests of washing. The miserable victim introduced the subject generally with a grin of superiority, as became a boy who had a father living in the flesh. It was very beautiful, then, to observe how that new boy, after the short fight which followed, became anxious ever after to avoid the subject of charing and charwomen; for however big that boy was Leonard went for him, and however often Leonard was knocked down he arose from Mother Earth bruised and bleeding, but fresh. The bigger the new boy, the more prolonged was the fight. The more resolute the new boy, the more delightful to spectators was Leonard's bull-dog tenacity. Once or twice the battle was drawn by foreign intervention. Never once was Leonard defeated.

After each battle we walked home proudly certain of receiving the Captain's approbation when he learned the casus belli; for he always insisted on hearing the full details, and gloried in the prowess and pluck of the boy.

We led a frugal life, because the Captain had little besides his half-pay and the house we lived in, which was his own, and had been his father's before him. Sunday was the day of the weekly feast. On that day the Captain wore his undress uniform, and we went to church in the morning. After church we walked round the walls, and at half-past one we came home to dinner. It was Leonard's privilege to pipe hands for the meal, which always consisted of roast beef and plum duff, brought in by the Captain's one servant, while Leonard played on the fife the "Roast Beef of Old England." After dinner there was a glass of port all round, with a double ration for the chief, and fruit for the boys. In the evening we read aloud, the Captain acting as expositor and commenting as we went; we did not go to church because the Captain said it was ridiculous to suppose there was any necessity for church oftener ashore than afloat. But after I got a piano I used to play and sing hymns till supper, when the Captain told us yarns.

When Leonard was fourteen another change was made. We left the school, and went, he and I together, to the Rev. Mr. Verney Broughton, as his private pupils. Mr. Broughton, the perpetual curate of St. Faith's, gave us, as I have since learned, these lessons at his own request, and gratuitously, though he was far from being a rich man.

Our tutor was a scholar of the old-fashioned school; he was an ex-fellow of Oriel, and openly held the opinion that nothing new had been written for about eighteen hundred years: he considered science, especially mechanical science, as unworthy the study of a scholar: he looked on Latin and Greek verse as the only safe means of educating the higher faculties: and he regarded the great writers of Rome and Athens as the only safe models of style, thought, and taste.

He was a stout, short man, with a red face, due, perhaps, to his fondness for port, his repugnance to physical exercise, and his habit of spending all the money he could spare on his dinners. A kind-hearted man, and a Christian up to his lights. His method of "working" his parish would hardly find favour in these days of activity, consisting, as it did, in nothing whatever except three services on Sunday and one on Wednesday and Friday evenings. No mothers' meetings, no prayer meetings, no societies, no early celebrations, no guilds. His sermons were learned and scholarly, with a leaning towards morality, and they inculcated the importance of holding Church doctrines. He was a Churchman high and dry, of a kind now nearly extinct. Those who wanted emotional religion went to other places of worship; those who were content with the old paths sat in their square pews every Sunday, and "assisted" in silence at a service which was a comfortable duet between parson and clerk.

We were put through the classical mill by Mr. Broughton. The course made me, in a way, a scholar. It made Leonard a man of action. He read the Homeric battles, and rejoiced to follow the conquering Diomede in the "way of war." He read the tragedies of Euripides, and, like all boys, espoused the cause of Troy the conquered.

He had, however, no inclination in the direction of scholarship, and persisted in looking on books as, on the whole, a rather disagreeable necessity in the training for after life. For, with the knowledge of his first beginnings ever present in his mind, there grew up in him more and more strongly a resolution that he would make himself a gentleman. Somehow—he did not at all know how—but by some path or other open to lads who are penniless, alone in the world, and almost friendless, he would become a gentleman. Thus, when the Captain proposed that he should enter the Navy as a master's assistant, Leonard scornfully refused on the ground that he could be nothing under the rank of combatant officer. Mr. Broughton suggested that the two Universities are rich with endowments, and that fellowships await those who are strong enough to win them; but Leonard would not hear of the years of study before the prize was reached.

"In the old days, Laddy," he said, "I should have been put into a monastery, I suppose, and made my way by clinging to the skirts of a great ecclesiastical minister, like Richelieu and Mazarin. But I cannot go in for the modern substitute of university and fellowship. Fancy me in a black gown, when I should like to be in a uniform!"

"In the old days," I said, "men sometimes forced their way by joining the Free Companies."

"Ay," he replied, "that was a life worth having. Fancy riding through the country at the head of a thousand lances, gentleman adventurers every one, a battle every other day, and an adventure the day between. What a pity the time is past for Free Companies! Let us go on the Common and see the soldiers."

That was his favourite resort. The march and movement of troops, the splendour of the array, the regimental bands, the drill of the awkward squad, delighted his soul. And here he would stand contentedly for half a day, watching the soldiers at their exercises.

"If one could only be a soldier, Laddy," he would say, "if there was any chance of rising, as there used to be in the French army! Every drummer boy with a marshal's baton in his pocket."

"And how many were able to take it out of their pocket?"

"One here and there. I should have tried to be that one."

One day, as he was talking in this strain, a soldier's funeral passed us—his comrades carried the coffin. Before it marched the fifes and muffled drums playing the Dead March, behind it a file of men with arms reversed. We followed. After the short service the men fired a round over the nameless grave, and all marched off at quick step.

"That one has failed, Leonard," I said.

"Ay, he has failed. Poor common soldier! He had but a slender chance. None of them have any real chance."

He was dejected for a few minutes. Then a thought struck him, and he brightened up.

"Perhaps he was only an ignorant, beer-drinking clod. No doubt that was all. Fah! What chance could he have? Such a soldier was not a failure, Laddy. He rose in the world. He became drilled, civilised, and useful. And when he died he was buried with military honours."

At sixteen he gave up his classical work altogether, arriving at the conclusion that it was not by Latin and Greek he would reach his aim. Other things, he discovered, would be of more use to him. Among them was French. He found in the Polish Barrack two or three men who knew French as well as their own language, one of whom undertook for a very small fee to teach him. He worked at the new study almost feverishly, learning the language after his own way, by reading French books all day, by talking with his tutor as much as possible, and by learning whole pages of the dictionary. As we had no French books in our little library, we picked up for a trifle at a bookstall a packet of old French newspapers and pamphlets dated about the year 1809, which probably once belonged to some French prisoner in the long wars, and these formed Leonard's introduction to the French language. His spare time he devoted to mathematics and to drawing. Here the Poles helped him again, many of the poor fellows being full of accomplishments and knowledge, so that, for the last year of his home life, Leonard was almost wholly in the Polish Barrack. The exiles, to whom this bright and handsome lad was a godsend of sunshine, rejoiced to teach him what they could, if only as a break in the monotony of their idle lives. And while I was welcome among them for my name's sake, Leonard was welcome for his own sake. They taught him, besides French, mathematics and drawing, how to speak Russian, how to ride, with the aid of borrowed steeds, how to fence, and what was the meaning of fortification.

As Leonard approached manhood he assumed a prouder carriage, due partly to the resolution within his heart, and partly to the defiance natural to his position. Mrs. Jeram said he was a prince born. Certainly no one acted the character better. Everything that he did was princely: he spoke as one born to command: with his quick keen eye, his curly locks, his head flung back, his tall and slender figure, full of grace and activity, he was my hero as well as my leader and protector.

He would not associate with any boys in the town—those boys whose society was open to him—nor would he suffer me to know them. "You are a gentleman of Poland," he said, grandly. "You may call yourself a Count if that would help you. I am going to make myself a gentleman, whatever my father was. We must not hamper ourselves by early friendships which might afterwards prove annoying."

It was not altogether boyish bounce, nor altogether self-conceit, because, full of sympathy in other things, in this he was inexorable, that nothing whatever should interfere with his determination to lift himself out of the ranks. And almost the only reading he permitted himself lay in any books he could find which showed how men have risen from small beginnings to great things. Not greatness in the way of authorship. He had no feeling for literary success. "I would like," he said, "to have my share in making history, let who will write it. Who would not rather be Hannibal than Livy, or Hector than Homer? If you were to offer me the choice between Sir Philip Sydney and Shakespeare I would rather be Sydney. All the greatest men have been soldiers and sailors—fighting men."

Then he would dilate on the lives of the French generals, and tell how Murat, Lannes, Kleber, Hoche, Augereau, and Marmont, fought their way valiantly up the ladder from the very lowest round.

How his purpose was to be accomplished, by what means he was to rise, he never explained. Nor did he, I think, ever seriously consider. But we all believed in him. The Captain, Celia, Mrs. Jeram, and I looked forward confidently to the time when Leonard should rise, superior to all disadvantages, a leader of men. If he had told us that he was going to become Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, or even H.R.H. the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, we should have believed that with the same confidence.

One day—it was Saturday, about Christmas time—Leonard did not come home to dinner. The Captain waited for no one, and we sat down without him. It was three o'clock when he returned, and it was evident that something had happened, for his face was flushed and his hands trembled.

"I have been with Mrs. Jeram, sir," he said, in reply to the Captain's look of inquiry. "She has told me about my mother," his voice breaking into a sob, "about my poor mother."

He buried his face in his hands.

"Ay, ay. Poor boy. Natural to ask." The Captain put out his hand and stroked Leonard's curls.

"Mrs. Jeram," Leonard lifted his head and went on, "gave me all she left. Only a wedding-ring. Nothing but a wedding-ring. See, and a message. A strange message. 'Tell my boy,' she said, when she died, 'that if ever he finds his father he must forgive him; but he had better not seek for him. And tell him, but not till he grows up, that his father is a gentleman and his mother was a lady.' That was the message, sir."

"Ay!" said the Captain, clearing his throat. "I knew it long ago, Leonard. Mrs. Jeram told me, when you came here, you and Laddy—you were both alike—gentlemen born——"

"How shall I forgive him?" asked Leonard, springing to his feet, panting and trembling. "How shall I forgive the man who let my mother—his wife—die deserted and alone?"

"The Rules are laid down," said the Captain, gravely, "clear and distinct. 'Forgive us as we forgive.' Likewise 'Honour thy father.'"

Leonard was silent.

"And as for this wedding ring," said the Captain, taking it from the boy's hand, "I think, if I were you, I would wear it always." He opened a drawer and found a piece of black ribbon. "Uniforms," he went on, without my seeing the connection, at first, "uniforms and badges are useful things. You can't do anything disgraceful in the Queen's uniform. Clergymen wear black to show they are in mourning for the world's sins. Do you wear this ring as a badge only known to yourself, my boy. A wedding ring—it's a pretty thing," looking at the symbol lying in his hand—"it means Purity and Faith. If you wear it, boy, in that sense, your mother's memory will be honoured. Purity and Faith. Perhaps we've given the ring to the wrong sex."

The Captain turned in his chair, and took up a book. It was his sign that he had no more to say on the subject.

Leonard touched my arm, and we stole out together. Then we took our hats, and went into the street.

"I cannot bear myself, Laddy," he burst out. "I am half mad to think of it. She was deserted; she wandered about, and came here. Mrs. Jeram picked her up, houseless and crying in the street. She had a little money then, but the Doctor took it all, because next day, before she could say who she was, or where she came from, I was born, and my mother died. Not a line, not a letter, to say who she was; Mrs. Jeram took me, and promised her whose life—Oh! my mother—was passing swiftly from her—that she would bring me up"—he stopped her for a moment—"And then she died, and they buried her. . . . Do you know where the paupers are buried, Laddy? They buried my mother there."

Yes, I knew. Some of the Poles were buried there. The old parish church, with its broad churchyard, stood a mile and a half from the town. The God's Acre was so crowded with graves that its surface was raised six feet above the level of the road, and the tombstones stood side by side, almost touching each other. But in one corner there was a large open space on which there where no stones, where the grass grew thinly, and where the newly-turned clay, if you looked closely, was full of bits of wood, remains of old coffins. There was no shape to the graves in this corner; only rows of shapeless mounds and irregular unevenness in the ground. This was the paupers' corner, the place where they bestowed those for whose funeral the parish had to pay, so that the contempt of poverty followed after them, and rested on their very graves. I knew the place well, and shuddered when Leonard turned his steps to the road which led to the church. It was nearly four, and the early winter's day was drawing to a close. From a sky almost black poured down great flakes of snow, silently falling and giving an appearance of light after the hidden sun had gone down. As our heels echoed on the iron bridges beyond the Gate, I looked round and saw the ramparts standing up white and smooth, like a great wedding cake against the gloomy heavens. Down in the moat, the sluggish water lay between two banks of dazzling white, flanked with scarp and counterscarp. Leonard hurried on, and we passed in silence along the streets of the suburb, and so into the fields beyond, till we came to the church standing with its old tower among the dead.

It was growing dark now, in spite of the snow.

The iron gates of the churchyard were open, and the church, where the choir were practising for next day's service, was partially lighted up. Leonard led the way to the far-off paupers' quarter.

It lay, a quarter of an acre in extent, quiet and peaceful, wrapped in the pall of the soft white snow. About the rest of the crowded churchyard there were paths among the graves, up and down which were the footsteps in the snow of those who came to visit the dead. Here there were no paths and no footsteps. In the rest of the churchyard there was always some one to be seen—a widow leading her child to see the father's grave, an old man wandering among the monuments of those he had known in their youth, a sister weeping over a brother's grave, a mother over her son—always some one to connect the world of the dead with the world of the living. Here no one came to break the lonely silence of the forgotten graves. Elsewhere there were flowers in spring, cypresses and evergreens in and among the graves. Here there was nothing, not even a struggling briar, and even the grass was so often disturbed that it had not time to grow. For these were the graves, not of the poor, but of the very poor, of those hapless mortals who die in the misery of destitution, and have not even money enough left to buy them a separate resting-place. They lay there, thickly crowded, and every one forgotten. For among their own class Death speedily brings oblivion. Who can remember those that are gone before when from hour to hour one has to think about the next meal? Whether they were buried ten years before or only yesterday, the hundreds who lay before us in that corner, covered over with a thin layer of mould and the sheet of snow, were everywhere as absolutely forgotten as if they had never even lived. Was it to rescue the dead from this ignoble oblivion that people once worshipped their ancestors?

And amongst them, somewhere, was Leonard's mother.

"Where is she?" he whispered. "Oh! in what spot did they lay her? A lady, born of gentle parents, the wife of a gentleman, to die neglected and be buried like a pauper! And not to know even where she is laid!"

"That does not matter, Leonard," I said weakly. "Her spirit is not in her grave."

He made no answer, but flung his arms above his head.

"My poor dead mother," he prayed, "my poor lost mother. I believe that you can see and hear me, though you cannot come to me. If you can help me where you are, help me. If you can pray for your son, pray for me. If you can lift me upwards, lift me. But how can I forgive my father?"

Within the church, close by, they were practising the responses to the Commandments. And as Leonard concluded they sang,

"Incline our hearts to keep this law."

He heard the words and applied them, for he turned to me in that quick way of his,

"How can I honour my father, Laddy, when I don't know where he is, or what he is, and when my mother's last words were that I should forgive him?"

But his passion was over, and we walked away from the old churchyard.

CHAPTER VI.

CELIA

I CAN hardly remember a time when I did not know Celia, but, as my memory of the life with Mrs. Jeram does not include her, our acquaintance must have sprung up some time after we went to the Captain. It was formed, I suspect, upon the walls where we were sent to play, and was allowed, or encouraged by Mrs. Tyrrell, Celia's mother, one of the Captain's friends. Our playground was a quiet place, especially at our end, where the town children, to whom the ramparts elsewhere were the chief place of recreation, seldom resorted. There were earthworks planted with trees and grass, and the meadows beneath were bright with buttercups and daisies. We were privileged children; we might run up and down the slopes or on the ramparts, or through the embrasures, or even clamber about the outer scarp down to the very edge of the moat, without rebuke from the "Johnnies," the official guardians of the walls, who went about all day armed with canes to keep boys from tearing down the earthworks. It was this privilege, as well as the general convenience of the place for children to play in, which took us nearly every day to the Queen's Bastion. There never was a more delightful retreat. In summer the trees afforded shade and in winter the rampart gave shelter. You were in a solitude almost unbroken, close to a great centre of life and busy work; you looked out upon the world beyond, where there were fields, gardens, and trees; there was our own round corner, with the stately elms above us; the banks of grass, all sorts of grass, as one finds where there is no cultivation, trembling grass, foxtail grass, and that soft, bushy grass for which we had no name; there was the gun mounted on its high carriage, gazing out upon the harbour, a one-eyed Polyphemus longing for human food.

We walked and ran about the walls, we sat, read, and talked in Celia's Arbour. I was the principal reader, because Leonard used to act what I read, and Cis always wanted to do what Leonard did.

My usual seat was on the wheel of the gun-carriage, or in warm weather I would lie extended full length on the grass, while I read, in the high-pitched voice which Nature or my rounded back had given me, the narrative which stole us from ourselves. Why does no one write such books now? We were Don Quixote and Sancho Panza; we were Robinson Crusoe and Man Friday, that is, Leonard was Don Quixote or Robinson, while Celia was Sancho or Man Friday. Up the harbour was a flat little island, a peninsula at low tide, on which was a farmhouse. I dare say it must have been a dismal place to live upon, and by no means free from rats. But to us it was charming, for it was Robinson's Island. To this day I cannot look at the book without seeing the island again, and peopling it once more with the Solitary and his faithful Indian. When we read the "Pilgrim's Progress" Leonard with a stick personated Christian's terrific combat with Apollyon. Or, if we chanced upon the second part, Celia was Mercy, and knocked very prettily at the gate while Leonard multiplied himself, and became in turns, or at the same time, the Dog, Beelzebub, and the Interpreter.

It was Leonard who called this place Celia's Arbour, after a glee which I found among Mrs. Tyrrell's music. The harmonies of the old four-part song lie in my heart associated with those early days, and with our own retreat. It is a tender glee, whose notes are yearnings and sighs, whose cadences are love's hypocrisies, breathing an almost arrogant confidence; while veiled behind a mask of pretended fear, assumed out of good manners, and certain to deceive no Celia that ever lived. We breathed no sighs, we hung no humid wreath by our Celia's Arbour, but it was a place where two boys learned to love one girl.

She was at first a wilful and uncertain little maid, her moods like the April sky for fitfulness, her way for the moment the one right way; her will law. She would have been a despot of the fiercest kind, but for one thing which saved her. It was her gift of reading the hearts of those she knew. If by that power of hers she read mine, and so could say with unerring instinct the thing she had to say, always in the way it should be said, then, I suppose, she could read others. That wilfulness wore off as she grew up, but the mysterious power remained. She felt, or seemed to feel, what others thought. It is quite certain that this power can belong to those who think little about themselves, and comes from long watchfulness in observing the connection between thought and expression, and learning how to read the lightest flash of the eye. She was an only child, and her father was the very greatest man in all the town. Not that he was greater than the Governor Commandant of the Forces, or than the Port Admiral, but he was the greatest man of the municipality. He held, or had held, all the offices. He was a borough magistrate, ex-Mayor, chairman of everything, churchwarden, Past Master of the Masons' Lodge, and leader in everything. In person he was tall and portly, bearing himself with an upright and solid carriage. When he passed down the street the shopkeepers came to their doors and bowed; mothers pointed him out to their boys as an object of emulation; all the town respected him. He deserved their respect for showing them what Leonard was so anxious to find out for himself, how a man may rise in the world. He had been errand-boy in a lawyer's office; he worked every evening, and so got learning, and he finally found himself at forty the leading solicitor and the most "prominent citizen" of the town.

He lived, after the fashion of the time, in the same house where he had his offices. It was a large red brick house, the very last in Castle Street before you came to the town wall. It had the door in the middle opening into a broad hall with a large room on either side. These were the offices, and in addition to them was a certain structure built out at the side devoted to the clerks. The dining rooms and Mrs. Tyrrell's habitual sitting-room, called the parlour, were at the back, overlooking a garden, large for a town house, planted with standard apples and pears, and standing behind borders in which flourished the common old-fashioned flowers, Virginia stocks, candy tuft, mouse-ear, London pride, double stocks, wallflowers, gillyflowers, and the rest, including big hollyhocks, round which bees swarmed all the summer, planted in the corners. A gate at the end of the wall was unlocked all day, so that Celia and I could pass in and out without seeing or disturbing the clients. On the first floor was Mrs. Tyrrell's drawing-room, a salon which impresssed the visitor with a sense of really aristocratic magnificence, so cold, so prim, and so very comfortless was it. It was never used, except for a dinner party, that is, once or twice in the year. For lighter entertainments, such as "a few friends to tea," the parlour was thought quite good enough. Celia's piano was in the parlour; there was a grand in the drawing-room; downstairs you found comfort and ease; upstairs splendour and cold.

The daily life of a professional man, thirty years ago, was a good deal simpler, though in many ways more conventional, than at present. He lived almost always, like Mr. Tyrrell, in the house where he had his office; he dined at one o'clock, and his dinners were extremely plain. At five he took tea, with bread and butter; at eight he finished work for the day, dismissed his clerks, and sat down at nine with his family to supper, the most cheerful meal of the day, going to bed at half-past ten.

There was no talk in those days of a month on the Continent, of the necessity for change, or an autumnal holiday; a dance for the young people might be looked for, in some quarter or other, three or four times in the year; to dance in the summer was unheard of; garden parties were never dreamed of; lawn-tennis—even croquet—not yet invented; picnics things to imagine. There was a large garrison in the town, but the officers rarely appeared at the houses of the lawyers, and kept in their own sets; the best available society consisted of the numerous half-pay and retired naval officers, with the clergy and the professional men, and the maidens, who were far more "proper" than are their daughters of rinks and Badminton, looked on a friendly gathering to tea, with a little music afterwards, or a round game, as the highest dissipation consistent with properly brought up young ladyhood. Yet they were perfectly happy. They did not read so much; they did not know so much as their successors; their taste in Art, Dress, Furniture, and Decoration had not been developed; they had not, like Ulysses, seen many men and many manners; they had no doubts on religion; they had not become strong-minded; they did not sit on School Boards, nor sigh for Female Suffrage; they had never heard of the Subjection of the Sex; they did not envy the wild delights open to rich young persons of their own sex in London, because they did not know them, except in terms too vague to be harmful. Yet they were, I should think, happier than the girl of the present day, because their hearts were set on simpler things. They dressed themselves as prettily as they knew how and could afford. I looked the other day in an old illustrated paper, and saw with a shudder the dresses of the girls whom I knew as a boy; the picture of female beauty adorned in the fashion of the day seemed a horrid caricature; but then the artist had not caught the sweet look of faces which not even a hairdresser can disfigure; and failed in showing the graceful lines which no foolish fashion-copyist can wholly conceal. Pass over the dress. They flirted a little, in their quiet way, after church on Sunday morning, and over the tea things in the evening. They read novels, of a decorous order, and not in the least like certain romances now in vogue, written "by ladies for ladies." In the course of time, one by one, they got married, and became good wives and good mothers with old-fashioned notions. It was peaceful, this vie de province, and would have been virtuous, but for the sin of gossip; it was calm, and might have been happy, but for the misfortune of monotony.

A certain conventionality hung about every act of family life which was, or might be, public. People pretended a great deal. If a visitor called—I speak from information received, and not from my own experience—the work which the young ladies were engaged upon was put aside hastily, and they were presented, on the rising of the curtain, so to speak, reading in graceful attitudes. There was a fiction that callers required refreshment, and the decanters were placed upon the table, with the choice of "red or white." I observed, at an early age, that Mr. Tyrrell, when he took wine, which was not every day, abstained from the decanters reserved for the use of visitors, and opened a fresh bottle for himself. I thought, in those days, that it was disinterested generosity on his part, so as to give his visitors the best, but I know better now. The duration of a visit was inversely proportionate to the rank of the caller. In the case of "carriage company," a quarter of an hour at the outside was granted, so much at least being needed to impress the street. Humbler friends, in whose case the decanters might be speedily put away, and the needlework resumed, could stay a whole afternoon, if they pleased. On Wednesday and Friday evenings those ladies who could boast of having "experienced" religion went to church, and gave themselves little airs on account of superior spirituality. No one ever dreamed of inviting himself to any meal whatever, and if anybody was invited, he was made to feel that he was the guest, being pressed to eat of things provided in his honour, and becoming, whether he liked it or not, the centre of conversation. There was, therefore, a good deal of ceremony in our social festivities. The handing of the muffins, the dexterous use of the kettle, the division of the cake at tea, the invitation to hot spirits and water after supper, the request to sing, the management of the album: all these things required grace and deportment; quite young men went through the prescribed duties with manifest anxiety; young ladies were careful not to allow their natural happiness over a little social excitement to interfere with the exigencies of propriety; middle-aged men took a pride in saying and doing exactly the right thing in the right way. Everything in bourgeois society of that time had a right way. It is true that this anxiety to keep in the groove prevented originality of conversation; but then we all knew what to expect, were able to criticise the performances, afterwards, of a well-known rôle, and to congratulate ourselves on the very proper way in which everybody had behaved.

Pretence is vulgar, but when it is custom it somehow ceases to vulgarise. We have our customs still, but they are not quite so binding on us. There were plenty of vulgar people among us, but we were not necessarily vulgar because we dined at one, supped at nine, gave few parties, never went abroad, and observed little fashions, with little pretences which deceived nobody. So far we were only simple. Celia at least, who was brought up in the lap of this conventionality, could not, could never have been vulgar.

On Sunday we went to St. Faith's Church, which stands in St. Faith's Square. The building belonged to the reign of the Third George, and was, externally, a great barn of red brick, set in a courtyard, surrounded by a red brick wall, and with a roof of red tiles. Inside it was a large white-painted edifice, resting on four pillars. There was a great gallery running all round, and, because the church was crowded, a second gallery higher up at the west end contained the organ and choir. The pulpit, reading desk, and clerk's desk, forming between them a giant staircase, stood in the middle of the church; all three were broad and roomy; round the altar rails sat a school of charity children, who pinched each other during the service. In the aisles were placed, between the pew doors, little triangular brackets, on each of which sat, in evident discomfort, an aged lady, clad in black. They used to rise, curtsey, and open the doors for the gentlefolk when they came and when they went away. I used to wonder why these ancient dames came to church at all, considering the profound misery of those three-cornered brackets. But I believe there was a dole of some kind for them, and once a month they had the satisfaction of finishing the sacramental wine. The arrangement of the pews was irregular, the better sort among them being square. In those you sat upon high narrow seats of rough baize, with your feet on large hassocks, which made your flesh creep to touch. The square pews were a great stumbling-block to children because they were convenient for making faces at each other, and this often led to subsequent tears. The Tyrrells had a square pew, in which little Celia sat always as demure as a nun. During the Communion Service, while the Epistle and Gospel were read, we all faced to the east out of politeness to the clergyman. Social distinctions were observed in getting up and sitting down. Poor people obeyed the summons of the organ promptly; those who had a position to illustrate got up in the Grand style, that is, slowly, and with deliberation. They were well on their feet at about the middle of the second line in the hymn, and they held their hymn books with an air of condescending criticism, as if there might, after all, be something in the words of the poet. At the close of the hymn they sat down as slowly as they had got up, long after the organ had finished, even some moments after the last of the old ladies in the triangular seats had ended her final squawk. And as they sat down they looked about the church as if to see that everybody was behaving properly. The Captain's pew, a long one, was behind Mr. Tyrrell's. Leonard often tried, but never succeeded in making Celia laugh. Not a single glance of her eye did she permit towards the pew where her two friends sat. Not a single smile when, Sunday after Sunday, the Captain lugged a key out of his pocket when the hymn was given out, and audibly instructed Leonard to "get out the tools," meaning the hymn books. During the sermon, the seats were so high that there was no one to be seen except the preacher and the clerk; the latter was always asleep. And when we came out, we walked away with much solemnity, the elders discussing the sermon.

Time that is long past appears to have been so much longer than any period of the present. In twenty years or so, I suppose I, for one, shall have finished my earthly career—perhaps before then. But it does not seem so long to me now, looking forward to the end, as it does looking back on those years of school and early life, on which I have dwelt, perhaps, at too great length. Being a lonely man, without wife, kith, or kin, I like to think of the days when I had a brother and a sister. To be sure, I have them still, unaltered in affection, but they are not here. In the long winter evenings, when I am tired of pupils and melancholy, so tired sometimes that even Mendelssohn cannot bring me comfort, I sit by the fire and see little Celia once more, as she was, wayward and fitful, restless as a sprite, bright as a sunbeam, rosy fingered as Aurora, dancing in and out among our hours, making them gay as a bright June morning; or standing as Minerva might have done, had that most unfortunate goddess ever known childhood, pensively looking out on the sunlit harbour; or, when she grew older, declaiming with passion against the wrongs she read of and the miseries she saw. For, as in every town where soldiers and sailors congregate, and drink is provided, there were many wrongs and much misery; wicked things which obtruded themselves upon even childish eyes. All evil seems to the young so easy to prevent and cure.

Sitting now by the winter fire, and gazing into the coals, it is always Celia that I see. She runs through my life like a scarlet thread in silk. And for five years—the five years of Leonard's "Wander Time," we were always together, for I was her tutor.

I forgot to mention that I was a musician. Music is my profession. I am a music master—"Mr. L. Pulaski" is on the brass door-plate, with underneath, "Lessons in Music and Singing." Music has been my joy and solace, as well as my profession. I believe I could play as soon as I was born; at all events I had no difficulty in learning; and when Mr. Tyrrell heard of my great gift, and generously presented me with a piano, I made myself, almost unassisted, a musician of skill as well as of feeling. For I played at every spare moment, and therefore I learned to play well. It was natural that I should help Cis in her music, and when I left school it was natural also that I should become not only her music master, but her tutor in other things, and her companion. It was good of Mrs. Tyrrell to trust her to me; it was an education for me to have the change. No brother and sister could have been drawn more closely together than we two. And I am quite sure that no man could love a girl more than I at all times loved Celia.

THE supposition that, in the event of the disruption of the Ottoman Empire, and the aggrandisement of Russia in the regions adjacent to the Mediterranean, England will endeavour to protect her main road to India by acquiring possession of Egypt, has been warmly discussed of late, and forms the subject of several articles in the leading magazines. In the Nineteenth Century, for example, Mr. Edward Dicey replies to Mr. Gladstone's remarks on this topic, and Herr von Bunsen, a member of the German Reichstag, contributes a sensible and statesmanlike paper on the same subject; while in the Fortnightly Mr. Goldwin Smith, who is always ready to scold his countrymen, furnishes a severe, but somewhat discursive, lecture on the aggrandising propensities of Englishmen. Of these three papers that by Herr von Bunsen is unquestionably the most interesting, because when dealing with such topics an intelligent foreigner takes a wider view than a native possibly can. Herr von Bunsen declares that if we determine to take Egypt Germany will not interfere with us, because she has little or no interest in the East, but he warns us that other Powers, France especially, may not be so amiable, and he also thinks that the loss of Egypt will be a more serious blow to the Sultan's sovereignty than the curtailment of his dominions on the Danube.—Sir Fitzjames Stephen writes an interesting paper on a subject which he has fully mastered, and which ought to be attractive to laymen as well as to lawyers—namely, the possibility of improving the law by private enterprise. He shows how the Statute Book, which has been already condensed from fifty or sixty volumes to twelve, might be still further boiled down; and gives other practical examples from the laws relating to land, contracts, &c. In fact, the article pleases us so much that we wish the Government would place the task of simplification in Sir F. Stephen's hands, giving him leave to select a dozen subordinates to help him. A few thousand pounds would be cheaply spent in this way.—Those who wish for a clear, summarised history of the Cape Colony and its offshoots from the first settlement of the Dutch, cannot do better than read Mr. E. D. Wilson's article on "South Africa." In his "Is Life Worth Living?" Mr. W. H. Mallock, a writer who has shown himself already as a formidable opponent of the Atheistical party, instead of attempting to confute their negative beliefs, asks what consolation for this life the man who believes neither in God nor a future life has to offer. The Atheistical gospel, he says, is very faithfully epitomised in one of George Eliot's poems, and he pronounces its reward to be utterly vague and unsatisfactory. This subject, "The Soul and Future Life," is further discussed in the "Symposium," which forms the concluding article.

In the Contemporary Mr. Goldwin Smith discusses the late railway riots in the United States, and takes a hopeful view of the situation. So far from Republicanism being in any way to blame in the matter, he points out that the most thoroughly Republican section of the States, namely, New England, escaped almost unscathed, and that most of the mischief was caused by foreigners, bred under repressive Continental monarchies. The worst rock ahead which America has at present to fear is, he thinks, the "heathen Chinee."—Mr. Howell, writing naturally from a Trades' Union point of view, gives some particulars concerning Intimidation and Picketing which are worth reading, although he softens down their repulsive features as much as possible. To our ignorant minds Picketing seems the very twin brother of Intimidation, and we fancy that a jury of non-unionist working-men's wives would say that there was no difference between them.—In his examination of "The Gospel according to St. John," M. Ernest Rénan refuses to admit, as may be expected, that it is the work of the Apostle himself. He places its date about the year 125, and though regarding it as "a writing of no value as affording a knowledge of how Jesus Himself spoke," considers that it is superior to the Synoptic Gospels as regards the order of facts, and that it embodies many genuine and valuable traditions unrecorded elsewhere.—"The Newest Thing in Journalism" attacks with a sharpness which is not always undeserved the swarm of newspapers which have appeared during the last few years, whose principal aim is to supply the public with frivolous and occasionally ill-natured gossip. Season ticket holders are, we imagine, the chief patrons of this branch of literature. In a railway carriage one needs big type, and topics which do not tax the brain very severely.

In the Fortnightly Mr. Montefiore writes a delightful article on Heine, whose prose writings deserve to be better known in this country. In spite of his Broad Churchmanship, the late Charles Kingsley had a horror of Heine, and curtly described him, in answer to a question from one of his children, as "a wicked man." To our thinking, however, Heine, compared to some of our modern sceptics, seems quite a light of orthodoxy; and it will generally be observed that his gibes were directed not at religion itself, but at something pretending to be religion. His remarks on the professional familiarity with which the clergy regard the Deity have a strong spice of truth in them; and the victory of Christianity over Paganism is most poetically rendered in his little apologue of the merry gods growing pale with terror when a bleeding Jew comes by and flings his cross with a terrible crash on their banqueting table.—Mr. Anthony Trollope carries his craft as a novelist into his paper on "Cicero as a Man of Letters," placing him before us not as the abstraction he is apt to seem to schoolboys, but as a real man like ourselves.

In Blackwood we have a pleasant paper on two recently-deceased Scotchmen of somewhat kindred tendencies, namely, Thomas Erskine, of Linlathen, and Dr. J. M. Campbell. Both were deeply religious men, though differing somewhat from the Church in which they were bred. In fact, Dr. Campbell was ejected on account of his adhesion to the views of Edward Irving, while the cardinal point of Mr. Erskine's teaching was "the fatherhood of God" towards His creatures. Christ, he held, as our elder brother, voluntarily took on him the penalty of sin, in order that the adopted children of the family of God might be conformed to His likeness.—"Tramps and Pedestrians" is a very agreeable and seasonable paper. After showing how much there is to be seen by those who go forth afoot in the home counties, Kent, Middlesex, Surrey, and even despised Essex, the author takes us further afield to Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and Spain, and everywhere finds something worth telling.

"Modern Prophets" in Fraser, though modestly signed "Unus de Multis," is, we shrewdly suspect, by Mr. F. W. Newman, who has, in his old age, abandoned some of the scepticism of his earlier years, and enlisted under the Unitarian banner. He is very severe on Messrs. Huxley, Tyndall, and other agnostic luminaries of the day. The chief aim of his paper is to show that if the Atheists prevail morality is in serious danger. Men who ignore God, who hold that existence ends with the grave, and that the lower animals are merely machines, destitute of feeling, at present exhibit no violent aberrations from the code of morals ordinarily received, because they are unconsciously influenced by their own early training, and by the general current of public opinion which flows from Christian tradition; but should a generation of atheists arise, who are the majority of the nation, and who have learnt their doctrines from infancy, they may carry these doctrines into practice in a very astonishing fashion. It is startling to note that if we eliminate the belief in God, and in personal responsibility, the very grossest breaches of morality become debateable matters.—One who has lived long in India gives an interesting though discouraging account of the progress of Christianity in that country. Christianity seems able to prevail against the child-like creed of savages, but makes little impression on such elaborate religions as Hindooism or Mahomedanism. Indeed, in India the influence of the English has been to make the natives freethinkers rather than Christians.—The able series of papers on "British Trade" are concluded in this number. The writer's general survey of the situation is very interesting, not the less so, perhaps, because he writes somewhat despondingly of the future prospects of our Empire. He thinks we made a great blunder in quarrelling with Russia in 1854; he foresees formidable commercial rivalry from the United States; he doubts our ability, in case of war with a first-rate Power, to protect our colonies; and he believes that Germany will ere long swallow Holland, and develop into a great naval and colonial Power.—Railway traffic managers will probably contest the soundness of Mr. Conder's statistics in his article on "Third Class Passengers." His conclusions are somewhat startling, for while declaring that passengers, especially third-class passengers, form the sheet-anchor of a railway revenue, he asserts that minerals are carried at a loss, and that the railway companies would act wisely if they left the carriage of coal to the canals and the steam colliers.

In the Cornhill we note the beginning of a new serial story entitled "For Percival." Mr. Dowden contributes a paper on some modern French poets in which he shows a good deal of critical discrimination; the praises of September as the pleasantest month of the twelve are sung by another writer (September, by the way, has hardly maintained his character during the last two or three seasons); while we have a very lively and readable essay on Lucian by one who thoroughly appreciates the gossiping old philosopher, who is probably far less read now than he was in the time of Erasmus.

Temple Bar is now strengthened by a story from the pen of Mrs. Edwardes, whom we naturally associate with a periodical in which some of her best work has appeared.—The sketch of "Life at Bucharest" is very àpropos, and gives a lively view of the gay Roumanian capital, which seems to be an attractive place in spite of bad drinking-water, and a climate as extreme as that of New York.—The sketches of Spanish barracks and hospitals are also very life-like, and as they add to the reader's knowledge of the people of the Peninsula, they add also to his interest in them.—"Chic," a word untranslatable into English, forms the subject of an amusing little essay.

The enthusiasm with which our American cousins pursue the study of English history is illustrated by two articles in the Atlantic Monthly, namely, Mr. Lounsbury's "Fictitious Lives of Chaucer," and Mr. Whipple's analysis of Dickens's "Great Expectations." As in another passage in this magazine, a writer, speaking of Mrs. Burnett's "That Lass of Lowrie's," complains of the difficulty which Americans experience in reading books written in provincial English dialects, we may feel some surprise that Dickens is so popular in the States, as many of his conversations and allusions must be beyond the range of ordinary Transatlantic experience. We observe that a Mr. Gill has written a new life of Poe, but he does not throw much fresh light on the complex character of that unfortunate genius.

Many persons will be surprised to learn from the trustworthy pages of the Geographical Magazine that the winter climate of Greenland, instead of being of a uniform severity, is remarkably changeable. For instance, while the mean temperature of February, 1863, at Jacobshavn was 24 deg., that of 1872 was + 16 deg., a difference of 41 deg., and the daily changes are equally great. These changes are due to the direction of the wind, which, if between S. and E. invariably raises the temperature, sometimes 40 deg. in a few hours.

We have also to acknowledge, among other periodicals, Macmillan, Charing Cross, Gentleman's, St. James's, Month, Good Things, Day of Rest, Leisure Hour, Sunday at Home, Weekly Welcome, Garden, Belgravia, London Society, Good Words, Lady's Treasury, Argosy, Science Gossip, Englishwoman's Domestic, Young Englishwoman, Chambers', Gardeners', Tinsley's, All the Year Round, St. James's, and Messrs. Cassell's usual serial publications.

THOSE serio-comic war-maps, the octopus map and its rival, are not much to boast of as works of art, and they have not even the merit of originality. The idea came from France, where during the siege of Paris in 1871 the Parisians got what comfort they could from the carte psychologique, dressée par Hadol. Here Russia is a huge giant, a croquemitaine, who, with three or four young bears playing about him like dogs, landing net in hand, watches what he can catch in the mêlée. France, brought to her knees and weeping, keeps one arm round her babes, Alsace and Lorraine, on whom the big, heavily-booted, spike-helmeted, cloak-laden Prussian has already laid his fingers; the Gallic cock, looking rather aghast, but still keeping his comb erect, forming the uninvaded province of Brittany. Ireland is a large basket full of gin bottles; and Great Britain, an old woman, irreverently like Her Majesty, the head being that part of the island which she chiefly inhabits, is tossing off a dram, the explanatory note being, "L'Angleterre s'oublie le gin." Austria and Hungary are shaking themselves out of the bed-clothes, and looking round scared at what Prussia is doing. Montenegro is making eyes at her neighbours, and hinting that she would like to be run away with; while Turkey in Asia is dozing over her hookah, forgetting the bear, who has already planted both his hind feet on her divan. There are too many clocks. The French joke just then was that the honestest Prussian, even he who was proof against very choice cigars and the best Burgundy, could not resist making off with a handsome timepiece if he had the chance. But in its effective drawing, no less than in its subdued colouring, it contrasts favourably with the garish octopus map, which, weak in other respects, fails so lamentably in its British Isles. Its Scot, for instance, is more like a stage Greek; and why should John Bull have a red umbrella? Of course Hadol did not originate the idea; the French had often indulged in such mild pleasantry before. Indeed, Lamartine's reconstitution of Europe in 1848, though he meant it au grand sérieux, was really a good joke; and several of the ex-Emperor's attempts at the same kind of thing certainly deserved to be called serio-comic.

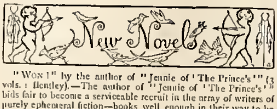
Not the least important of the changes introduced into the army of late years was the substitution of a system of "deferred pay" for the old plan of offering a bounty. The latter had few advocates; in time of war, when there was a great and sudden demand for men, the bounty money rose to a very large sum, and, perhaps, served its purpose for the time in attracting recruits. But it seemed to be generally admitted that it was an unsatisfactory way of obtaining them at best, and that it would sooner or later have to give place to some less rough and ready system. The evils which attended it were palpable, whilst its advantages were very dubious. The recruit upon joining received a (for him) very large sum of money, and found not the least difficulty in discovering disinterested friends who, so long as coin lasted, helped him to spend it very pleasantly, perhaps, but not very judiciously. It was in all likelihood not until his last penny had disappeared, and with it the last of his friends, that he began to realise that he had been making a very bad beginning. Hard as it might be to regain a character for steadiness, it is to be expected that many found it harder still to make the first attempt. The system of deferred pay was intended to deal with another evil also. Many soldiers received their discharge who had no means of subsistence, and who found it difficult to obtain immediate occupation. It was thought a great point that no ordinarily well-behaved man should be without something to fall back upon, and it was also believed that the fear of forfeiting the money which Government proposed to lay by for them would prove a strong incentive to good conduct, and a safeguard against desertion. In this hope, and in pursuance of this design, it was determined that an addition of twopence a day should be made to the daily pay of a soldier, during the first twelve years of his army service, but that the issue of this pay should be deferred until he had completed his army service, whether on final discharge or on entering the first class of the Army Reserve. Under these arrangements it has been calculated that a soldier who engages for short service will receive after three years' army service 9*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, though this sum is only payable after three years' service in the reserve, as this is the modification of the principle of short service, extending to six years, which we alluded to above. By it we understand that soldiers of good character who are in possession of a good conduct badge, and men who are likely to be able to obtain a livelihood, may be transferred to the Army Reserve before the expiration of their six years with the colours; in this case they would receive deferred pay for three years after they had made up the balance of six with the Reserve. A soldier who served six years with the colours would be entitled to 18*l.* 5*s.* as deferred pay; one who served twelve to 39*l.* 4*s.*; whilst those who complete twenty-one years' service would receive either 44*l.* 12*s.* or 47*l.* 6*s.*, according to the periods into which their total service was divided. Soldiers when transferred to the Army Reserve for the concluding period of their engagement receive fourpence a day. They are liable to be called out for drill occasionally, when they receive pay in addition at the rate of two shillings a day. An addition of twopence a day is also made as deferred pay to the pay of men of the first class Army Reserve.

The system of deferred pay seems to present such obvious advantages that it is not necessary to dilate upon them at length, and though many men may find the possession of a large sum of money a temptation to squander it, a system of payment by instalments is calculated to repress this. At all events, they will no longer be without means to tide over any reasonable lapse of time between leaving the army and obtaining fresh employment, and the matter will be very much in their own hands. Amongst other advantages which Government offers, and bearing upon the question of subsequent employment, are, the opportunities to learn a trade, by which money may be made while in the army, and a livelihood may be secured on discharge, and the benefit of a regimental school. Thus there appears nothing to prevent any soldier attaining at least a fair education in essentials, and one which cannot fail to advance his prospects in whatever employment he may ultimately find himself. The difficulty of a soldier discharged with a good character, and who can read, write well, and keep accounts, ought not to be so very great. We have not forgotten that we have before this suggested enlistment as a means of relieving the overcrowded ranks of applicants for work in both business and professions. But it was the enlistment of a distinct class, a class already well educated, and which might hope to find in the army a field for their energies. In the case of men, however, who entered the army almost, if not quite, uneducated, it would be very different, for though a few might show great talent and adaptability, and even obtain commissions, the majority would be quite content with positions which would only be accepted by the former class as a last resource, but of which there are not a few open to old soldiers. Nor can it be said that men discharged between the ages of twenty-four and thirty-seven are old in any sense of the term, or that it is hopeless for them to expect employment. For those who enlist for the full period of twenty-one years again there is the prospect of a pension for life varying from 8*d.* to 3*s.* a day, according to their rank and service. The former of these two sums is not imposing, but we may hope that ere long it will be increased, so that no soldier of twenty-one years' service entitled to pension shall receive less than a shilling a day. The ages of pensioners who had served their full period of twenty-one years would range from thirty-nine to forty-six at the time of discharge. Men of this age, with good characters, would have no difficulty in finding employment, and their pensions would be a useful assistance, as well as something to fall back upon in case of sickness. If they know a trade, they are, of course, in a better position, and as facilities are given to learn one in the army there can be no reason that any soldier should suffer from want upon his discharge. His deferred pay will now prove serviceable, enabling him to purchase tools and materials, and with his pension and superior knowledge of the world he will probably find himself in a better position than if he had continued to work as a labourer or artisan for the past twenty-one years of his life. He has also acquired, it is to be presumed, habits of discipline and self-restraint, and perhaps those of command, as a non-commissioned officer. In the latter case his prospects are still brighter, as he has, of course, a better pension, and the fact of his having been a "non-com." argues at least a fair education and a good character, and with these advantages at his back, and a round sum of money in his pocket, a man in the prime of life can scarcely fail to prosper, and at least need not despair of being able to earn a respectable livelihood. Too much importance cannot be attached to the facts that an education can be gained and a trade learned in the army. Enlistment means—looked at from a dispassionate point of view, and divested of the glories and pleasures of ribbons, unlimited beer, and a red coat to follow—going to school again. That is to say, a youth who may have neglected his opportunities, to use a cant phrase, and who finds himself stranded, need not wait for the tide of fortune; he can enter the army, and if he is undisciplined, he will find, as a rule, careful and earnest guides. If he is oppressed with a sense of ignorance, and experiences a desire for knowledge, he can pass through a course of sound instruction. The highest honours at a recent competition were gained by a non-commissioned officer who had devoted his leisure hours for three or four years to study. Apropos of this, we are glad to hear that shorthand is being studied by many soldiers. Its value can hardly be estimated, and every facility should be given to those willing to learn to acquire a knowledge of a sound system. When it is considered that a thorough knowledge of the art implies that by that alone a man can earn his living, and that, according to his experience and general aptitude for business, it adds to his value, it will be seen what an opening is afforded to those whose physique or previous training debars them from manual labour, or renders them unfit for menial employment. Opportunities should be given to learn at least one or other of two systems; that is to say, an elaborate one and a tolerably easy one which will answer all ordinary purposes. Reading, writing, and ciphering are the bases upon which many a man has built up a name and a fortune; they are the foundations of success. Shorthand may be called an accomplishment; but it is one which is daily being more and more called into requisition as an essential, and we need scarcely apologise for dwelling upon its value to those who will have eventually to seek employment as civilians.

Before leaving this subject it may be as well to state that soldiers wounded in action, or in any way maimed in the performance of their duty, are also entitled to a pension. To whom could a knowledge of an art, which is in itself not without its attractions to a man with spare time upon his hands, be more valuable than to one who has been unfitted for bodily labour by the chances of his profession of arms?

On first joining soldiers are supplied with clothing and a free kit, and whilst in performance of their duty receive a daily free ration of bread and meat, lodging, bedding, fuel, and light, medical attendance, and education. The food is ample, the lodging cleanly, the bed comfortable. Warmth and light, a doctor in sickness, with the medical comforts the case may require, honourable employment; what more can a reasonable man desire, unless by his own energies he can earn all these and superfluities to boot as a civilian? Only one thing is wanting, food for the mind, and that is now within the reach of every soldier. Regimental schools are provided, libraries, and recreation rooms are to be found at every station, amusements are promoted in every possible way; soldiers who excel as marksmen obtain valuable money prizes, and perhaps nearly as much is done in this direction as is good for the main body. It rests with individuals to avail themselves of their privileges, and to make the best of their opportunities.

When absent from their regiments upon furlough, soldiers may be granted an advance of full pay, and of whatever good conduct pay they may be receiving, together with sixpence a day in lieu of the rations that they cannot draw. Finally, deserving and educated soldiers have a prospect of speedy promotion to the various ranks of non-commissioned officers, with increased pay; and non-commissioned officers are eligible for commissions, provided they are recommended, and can pass the necessary examination. It may be said that in no other walk of life can a man who is willing to be disciplined, anxious to learn to do his duty, not too proud to obey peremptory commands, or to be "ordered about," as the phrase goes, knowing that it is necessary, can do as well with small beginnings as in the army. Who is not commanded either by superiors, necessity, or conscience? And the happiest are those who are led by the last-named general officer, who is rarely at fault. Let every soldier, young or old, remember that the aim of those who know and esteem the army most is to look upon him as a citizen bearing his share of the general burden, not as a mere machine. Let him remember that there are keen and studious minds by whom he is not forgotten, and that the appreciation of those whose opinion is worth having can be secured, and is freely given. Let him remember that the fortunes and chances of the daily battle of life, its apparent unfairness, the hardships and slights to be borne are not peculiar to soldiers any more than are the valour, patience, self-denial, and endurance necessary to combat them successfully. If he does this, and serves faithfully and courageously, it may be predicted that he will not ultimately have to complain of his lot. We may suggest, in conclusion, three mottoes, either or all of which can be applied by the recruit, the soldier, or the pensioner:—"Excelsior," as more peculiarly suited to the recruit; "Quo fata vocant," for the soldier; and for the veteran, "Finis coronat opus."



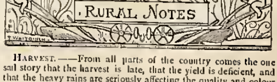
New Novels

"Won!" by the author of "Jennie of 'The Prince's'" (3 vols.: Bentley).—The author of "Jennie of 'The Prince's'" bids fair to become a serviceable recruit in the army of writers of purely ephemeral fiction—books well enough in their way to be read once with such qualified satisfaction as they are calculated to inspire, but which hardly any human being would dream of glancing at a second time. We cannot profess to rejoice in the appearance of another recruit to a body we hold already far too large, but it is only fair to the author to admit that her work is of quite as good a quality as that of the bulk of the novelists with whom she must be classed, and we see no reason why this second venture of hers should not receive as large a measure of popular favour as undoubtedly fell to the lot of her first. To try such a tale by any high critical standard would be out of place, and, indeed, absurd; still, we may suggest to the author that it might be well, at least for the present, not to attempt too bold a flight into what to her is the unknown. She has obviously no sort of personal experience of morbid psychology, and we very much doubt if she at all adequately realised what an absolute monster of iniquity she was presenting to our notice in the person of Sibyl Moreton, the mysterious beauty of an unearthly pallor, whose eyes are always veiled beneath the long-fringed eyelids—the reason being, as we ultimately learn, that they are of different colours, one blue, the other brown. No doubt a thoroughly bad woman is apt to be very bad indeed; but a creature of such unredeemed wickedness, as we in the end discover Sibyl to be, seems out of place in a story of everyday life, peopled otherwise by quite ordinary and commonplace characters. Moreover, a monster of iniquity, if introduced on the stage, ought to be made intelligible, and much of Sibyl Moreton's action strikes us as very far from being so. Why should she have set herself to acquire ascendancy over Hubert Carlton's fickle fancy, and so bring about an estrangement between him and his wife? She did not value the husband's devotion, and at first, at any rate, had no cause of quarrel against the wife. But, as we have already said, there is no occasion to inquire too closely into consistency and vraisemblance in estimating a book of this kind. Perhaps the sketches of Hamburg life—such as the bridal fête and the ice picnic—which we have in the first volume, are among the best scenes in the story. The visit to "Teak and Brine's" ship-breaking establishment is also very well told. In fact "Won!" is decidedly readable throughout, and, considering what it is, we do not know that we have a right to expect more of it. Its author, however, might remember that "to intrigue" is not in English a verb transitive.

"The Chickenborough Chit-Chat Club," by Kamouraska (3 vols.: Tinsley).—It is certain that in these three volumes we get very low down indeed in the depths of folly. The book is in truth so utterly and absurdly silly that it becomes at times almost amusing. The author is one of those persons known in certain circles as "a funny fellow," one "who will have his joke." The chief triumph of his humour seems to consist in contriving that every chapter of his work shall end with the four capitals "C. C. C. C.," generally standing for "Chickenborough Chit-Chat Club," but sometimes for "Corpus Christi College, Cambridge," and sometimes, we think, for something else. Another stroke of wit is the following:—There figures in the piece a Mrs. Potecary, who has three daughters—Maria, Meta, and Mina. By taking the first two letters of the Christian name of each, and adding to them the initial "P" of the surname, you produce "Map," "Mep," and "Mip," by which names the young ladies are facetiously designated throughout the story. Such are the "happy thoughts" which, with some broad farce and practical joking, make up one of the most nonsensical apologies for a novel it has yet been our fate to meet with.

"Edgar and I: The Story of a Home," by Jessie P. Moncrieff (Remington and Co.).—Ladies whose thoughts incline towards matrimony with High Church and ascetic rectors or curates may read this book with advantage, as giving them a glimpse of what may be in store for them. To most people Agnes, the wife of the Rev. Edgar Seymour, rector of a large parish in the East of London, will seem in this story to have a hard time of it. Her husband's love for her was, she says, "of that sort that he could bear to distress me if needful for my ultimate good; and the view he took of the tie between us was that I was a Christian soul more completely his charge than any other could be." Even before marriage Edgar warns his wife that they are "to love each other without self-indulgence as to mere feeling," and after they are married both Edgar and Agnes are so absorbed in "Church work" that they hardly really meet for more than half-an-hour each day, when, says the wife, "I don't mean to say our conversation was, even chiefly, confined to my faults." Still, though we are tempted to smile at the extreme asceticism of the book—an asceticism, we cannot help thinking, a little overdone and unreal—we fully recognise the purity and loftiness of thought and tone that characterise it. The actors in Miss Moncrieff's story are but striving after perfection as it has been conceived by the great saints of the Catholic Church, and their ideal is one that must command respect, however mistaken we may think it. We may add that most of the characters in the tale—which, somewhat to our surprise, is allowed a "happy ending"—are carefully and vigorously drawn.

We have also received "Lady Helena," by S. Vere (Remington and Co.), a slight tale, with which no fault in particular need be found, but which does not call for notice here; and a new edition, in one volume, of "For the Old Love's Sake," by Miss Iza Duffus Hardy (Moxon), forming one of "Moxon's Popular Novels."



RURAL NOTES

Harvest.——From all parts of the country comes the one sad story that the harvest is late, that the yield is deficient, and that the heavy rains are seriously affecting the quality and colour of the grain cut and uncut. A run down the other day into Westmoreland and Cumberland proved that those who have written about the unfavourable character of the harvest since the corn was in the ear have been promulgating no Cassandra stories. The rivers have overflowed their banks, and a week ago, in the Vale of Trent, many fields, with the corn standing and cut, were submerged, and from others it was evident that the waters had but recently receded after doing much damage. On the whole, however, the turnip crops look well, which is some consolation, and pasture fields are flourishing. The Colorado beetle has not arrived, except in specimen boxes, but over a wide tract of country the old insidious and mysterious blight is prevalent. Mr. Caird, who takes a favourable view of the harvest, estimates that our wheat crop will not be more than nine or ten million quarters this year, but calculations made before the corn is on the threshing-floor are often very fallacious. Our imports of wheat in the eight months of this year which have past have already cost us 20,459,395*l.*, and well on to 4,000,000*l.* more than in the corresponding term of last year. For other grains and flour we had paid up until the end of August no less than 18,741,937*l.*, in all for bread-stuffs 38,201,332*l.*, a large portion of which sum might be saved if better security of tenure were given in this country, and land better cultivated.

Foreign Meat.——Last month we had a larger supply of foreign animals, chiefly owing to increased importations from America, than we had in the corresponding month of 1876. Notwithstanding, the prices per head were 2*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* higher, being 22*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* against 20*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* Foreign sheep were much fewer in numbers, owing no doubt to some extent to the restrictions which compel German and Dutch sheep to be slaughtered at Deptford. The average price per head last month was 2*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, which is 8*s.* 6*d.* more than in August, 1876. For live stock the sum we paid in the first eight months of the year was 3,922,691*l.* Judging from the great falling-off in the imports of foreign bacon, our own agriculturists would appear to be paying more attention to the rearing of pigs than they were wont to do, although this is not made plain by the appearance of the Copenhagen Fields Market, where there are now very few specimens of the porcine breed to be seen. 4,020,525*l.* was the sum paid in the first three quarters of this year for bacon; in the corresponding period of last year it was 5,195,526*l.* The price per cwt. was 5*s.* 5*d.* higher than last year. The importation of fresh meat from America has reduced prices to the extent of 2*s.* 8*d.* per cwt., little more than a farthing per pound to the consumer, and it may well be doubted whether he derives the advantage. 11,370,930*l.* is the sum we paid for meat dead and alive during the eight months, and for butter, cheese, and eggs, 11,099,356*l.* The grand total of our bill to foreign agriculturists for farm produce we may mention was, exclusive of wool, 60,671,618*l.*, which is surely far too much. If our own cultivators cherished and cheered Mother Earth as she deserves, there would be a very different balance sheet in favour of this country.

SHORTHORNS.——Wonderful prices were realised, as we had anticipated in our last "Notes," for the shorthorns in the Lake district. From Mr. Loder and Lord Bective, Mr. Thornton, ere his sand-glass ran dry, secured from the former 4,100 guineas for one of the Bates tribe, Third Duchess of Hillhurst, and from the latter 4,300 guineas for another duchess of the same strain. These were imported animals from America, the sires and dams of which had been taken from this country. We have been stupidly silly in the case of shorthorns—the geese which were laying the golden eggs. It is expected that high prices will be made at forthcoming sales, as shorthorns are certainly the most "aristocratic breed" of cattle, and they are likewise plebeian enough to adapt themselves to nearly all countries and climates.

UNITED KINGDOM DAIRY SHOW.——This exhibition opens on the 3rd of October, and continues over five days. The prizes are very liberal. For Jerseys, those beautiful animals whose udders are so full of rich milk, 40*l.* is offered, the first prize being 25*l.*, besides a silver medal; the second prize is 10*l.*, and the third 5*l.* Guernseys come in for a like sum, and so also shorthorns in the same proportion. The shorthorns not eligible for the "Herd Book" are allotted 30*l.*, the first prize with a silver medal, which it may be mentioned is presented to first favourites in all the classes. For Ayrshires 40*l.* is offered for the Kerry breed, 15*l.* is offered in two prizes; and in another breed, pure or crossed, 35*l.* There is a champion subscription prize of 50 guineas to the exhibitor making the best entry in the above classes. For heifers, Channel Island shorthorns and any other pure breed there is respectively offered 21*l.* in these prizes, and a champion prize of plate valued at 20 guineas. For donkeys the prizes range from 10*l.* to 7*s.* 6*d.*; mules, from 10*l.* to 2*l.* In the class "for any variety used by their owners in business as a means of gaining a livelihood" the Baroness Burdett Coutts presents, with her usual generosity, 10*l.* to the costermonger showing the best groomed donkey whose appearance indicates receipt of kindly treatment daily.

MISCELLANEOUS.——M. Auguste Lippens, President of the Belgian Agricultural Society, with a number of agriculturists, is now in this country with the view of inspecting some of the noted shorthorn breeds. They have already inspected a few, and are impressed with their dairy qualifications.—The Porte has prohibited the exportation of cereals from Crete. The decree will not apparently affect this country.—In fear of the Colorado beetle the importation of potatoes from Germany to France has been prohibited. What a scare that wicked little bugbear is causing to postmen and potato-growers!

WIESBADEN UNDER A CLOUD

DURING the latter days of the Second Empire, Wiesbaden was in Paris considered to be one of the very choicest spots in the great world of fashion. Baden came to be under-estimated; every-one went to Baden, it was said, but only a select few penetrated to Wiesbaden. The Metternichs, the Gallifets, the Pourtalès, at last disdained the picturesque village in the valley, and turned their attention to the open plain of Wiesbaden. And for a time money poured into the Wiesbaden coffers. French, English, American, and Russian invaders thronged the place, hotels were full, shops throve, the Kursaal numbered thousands of elegant subscribers. The young lady who waited at the counter where the chicken-broth, flavoured with carbonate of soda dispensed by Dame Nature, was administered to the greedy followers of the "cure," had her hands so full that it was hard for her to be able to satisfy all the demands; the streets were crowded with private carriages; the theatre was packed night after night; and, in short, the cream of Paris, wit and elegance and vice, gathered in the exquisite gardens of the Kursaal in the light of the brilliant illuminations every evening during the short season to listen to Béla's incomparable orchestra. The most magnificent of magnificent dresses were displayed on the broad terrace giving on to the lake; beautiful faces shone in the dazzling glare of the gilded saloons, where all that was innocent, modest, and serious was certainly at a discount; and who shall say what sum of human misery was represented at those terrible tables, the green cloth of which ought have been black cloth, and the markers, skulls and crossbones. It is impossible to form an estimate of the tears and groans, the fruitless hopes, the unholy exultation, the greed, the absorbing avarice, the feverish excitement, the awful persistence, that were the usual appurtenances of the gaming-table. If tables could rap out their experiences, all Wilkie Collins's weird stories would sink into mere commonplace in comparison with the romances revealed by the four-legged implements of torture at Wiesbaden and Baden. Few persons, however, care to probe their pleasures to discover whether they are beneficial or prejudicial to the people at large, and in the excitement of the race for money, it was hardly to be expected that the butterflies and moths, that buzzed about MM. Benazet and Blanc's luring light, should stop in their whirl to consider the fearful example they were giving to the rest of the world. While the light shone, the butterflies buzzed—but presently the fiercer fire of civilisation extinguished the one—and the others collapsed, and their old haunts know them no more.

Wiesbaden is now deserted by its whilom habitués; with the gambling element, the elegance, the chic, the fashion has also departed; nurses and children are installed in the leafy green alleys where only the most favoured of Fortune's children once penetrated; German shop-girls with their crowns of plaits and simple dresses parade the gardens in the evening to the music of a very inferior band, in place of the magnificently robed queens of fashion who laughed and flirted, and talked epigrammatic nothings to the music of Béla or Strauss. The gorgeous ball-room of the Kursaal is empty night after night; the young ladies who preside at the elaborate stalls of the bazaar-arcades leading to the Wilhelmstrasse are busy at their knitting, and are rarely called upon to put their work aside and display their wares; groups of waiters stand about the hotel doors; there are no horses or carriages to be seen, with the exception of the plebeian tram, in the broad boulevard-like alleys; the distributor of the before-mentioned natural chicken-broth and soda sits by the hour together reading her newspaper as she knits; German merchant princes occupy the seats on which princes of the blood have lounged; and German motherhood and daughterhood sit in the shade of the trees that have sheltered the painted and powdered cheeks of aristocratic cosmopolitan beauty from the sun and the wind.

Undoubtedly, Wiesbaden is in its decadence. As a thoroughly artificial place—artificial from its gardens and lake to the lilies in its fountains!—it depended entirely on what may be termed an artificial public. Directly the bait that drew the public was gone, visitors ceased. When once the gaming table was suppressed, there was nothing to attract the great international world of fashion. No one dreamed of visiting Wiesbaden for its scenery, and the waters that drew the greatest number of so-called invalids were far more tempting yet far more bitter to the taste and powerful in effect than the chicken-broth mixture. The short Wiesbaden season used to attract over 40,000 foreigners to the town; and the list of arrivals registered in the Wiesbadener-Baden-Blatt for the last week in August of the present year numbered 1,396 persons, of whom only 166 were foreigners—that is, 116 English people, 33 Americans, 15 Prussians, and 2 French people! Who would have believed ten years ago that the time would come when only two French persons should arrive in Wiesbaden in the course of one week in the height of the season! Many people argue that the change is an improvement, that the Germans can now enjoy their own town without dread of ruin by extortion, that German mothers can bring their daughters to hear the music at the Kursaal without fear of contamination to the minds of the budding Charlottes who are knitting innumerable socks preparatory to the cutting of unlimited bread and butter; but however admirable the modern change may be, it cannot be considered a commercial improvement. The Germans will not pay high prices, and will have the very utmost that can be obtained for their money; so the German era in Wiesbaden means the reign of bankruptcy. When the Americans, the Russians, and the English desert a pleasant resort, it is doomed commercially. The cry of "Hard Times" is on every lip in Wiesbaden—you can hardly look into a shop the master of which does not come to the door to tell you how bad business is; the man who sells you a three days' old newspaper implies that your purchase is a sheer stroke of luck; and the faces brighten all down the bazaar-arcade as the Englishman, with the omnipresent red Baedeker in hand, appears. German visitors may bring respectability, and they undoubtedly bring noise and smoke,—but they do not bring trade. They do not want the thousand and one inutilities which the foreigners purchase readily—they are not particular or elegant as to costume, and would not dream of buying the airy nothings in lace and gauze displayed in shop windows; they do not require photographs of celebrated spots in their own country—just conceive an Englishman at Scarborough buying a view of St. Paul's Cathedral!—in short, they want nothing more than a cheap hotel or lodging, a chair for their afternoon lounge, which they get without payment, and at the worst, for refreshment in the Kursaal gardens, a glass of beer, for which they will be charged one penny or twopence. It is not strange therefore that "business" is at a low ebb in this once the most fashionable and prosperous town on the Continent. A cloud undoubtedly hangs over Wiesbaden; let us hope that it has at least a silver lining!

AN IRISH WATERING PLACE

"THE 'OWLISHER"

ON the south coast of Ireland stands a small seaport called Youghal, which was made famous by Sir Walter Raleigh when he planted the potato there, and introduced for the first time that delicate succulent to the people of Great Britain. I fear, however, that this fact; so intimately connected with the historic importance of Youghal, has been lost sight of by the world, and people are nowadays content to eat the potato without inquiring into its history.

Youghal is a very old town, and is situated near the mouth of the River Blackwater, which empties itself into the harbour, and flows onward to the sea. It is a quaint, ramshackle place, with long narrow streets full of tumble-down houses, and here and there the rugged remains of some ancient castle still slowly crumbling away and contesting inch by inch against the destroying hand of Time.

A little way outside the town there is a splendid beach running for miles by the sea, and a line of hills runs parallel with the beach, and affords a magnificent view of the neighbouring coast, and a broad stretch of the Atlantic Ocean. At the period in which I visited Youghal I found it full of visitors from the country, who had come there in order to "take the salt water," as they expressed it. They were, for the most part, small farmers with very large families, and from the style and mode of living they adopted it was clear that they were not overburdened with money: but Irish people can enjoy themselves on very little. They mostly "put up" at small houses in the outskirts of the town, where they were accommodated at a very cheap rate; and I was given to understand that a large party would hire one small room, and so arrange their plans that whilst half of them went to bed for the first portion of the night the other half wandered about in the open air, coming in at say, twelve o'clock and taking possession of the apartment until the morning. This was economy with a vengeance, but it was a matter of simple necessity with them. They spent the days lolling about the beach and the cliffs, staring at the sea when they were not bathing in or drinking it. These summer visitors were called "'Owlishers" by the inhabitants of Youghal, which is equivalent to that employed on this side of the water to characterise country people—viz., "Greenhorn," though of the two, perhaps the former is the least complimentary. But the "'Owlishers" cared very little indeed about the chaff or cajolery indulged in by the townspeople; they were proof against "the shrilling shafts of subtle wit" which were shot at them, and gave their whole attention to the restoration of their health, and the quiet enjoyment of their stay at the seaside.

Now it is a common belief among these "'Owlishers" that the salt water is a sovereign remedy for almost every disease and complaint, and during their stay by the sea they spend many hours each day applying it inwardly and outwardly with a patience and industry that show the force and strength of their faith in its curative properties.

I can recollect one morning, at a very early hour, seeing two "'Owlishers," or countrymen, walking gravely, with their hands tucked under their coat-tails, towards a large pool among the rocks, from which the tide had receded. They seated themselves by this pool, and as one of them took a tin mug from his pocket he said:—"I mane to have a few pints this mornin', Pat, seein' we must be goin' home before Thursday next," and filling the mug, he drank off its contents, and then handed it to his companion. They continued drinking until the pool had visibly grown smaller, when the gentleman addressed as Pat said, "Well, it's a wonderful stuff, no doubt, Tim, but you can't help feeling quare after six mugfulls."

"Well, the more you take, the longer you'll live," answered his companion, "an' if I wasn't goin' to have a few pints more, please God, later on, I'd finish this pool before breakfast. You know little Patsy, my boy," he continued; "well, when that child came here first I made him take near a pint for a dose,—but here's a gintleman wants a sup perhaps. You can have the mug, sir, wid pleasure."

I declined this offer with thanks, and resumed my walk. I didn't go far, being anxious to watch these "'Owlishers" taking a dip, and to observe how they behaved in front of the waves. I had reason to suspect that they were not good swimmers, and I determined to warn them against going too far if I saw any recklessness in their conduct. Before long the eldest, who was a bald-headed man of perhaps sixty years of age, approached "the sad sea waves," quite prepared for his dip. The waves rolled in in huge volumes, and fell crashing on the sand with thunderous roar, but one might walk out for half a mile nearly without danger, and enjoy being knocked about by those "wild sea horses." The aged "'Owlisher" had several holy "orders" dangling about his neck, besides a large brass crucifix that would certainly have handicapped him in a serious manner if he were engaged in a swimming match. When he reached the verge of the sea he stooped forward, and, without wetting his feet, dipped his hand into the surf, and made the sign of the cross upon his forehead several times in rapid succession. This is a common custom in Ireland with Roman Catholics before entering the water. Well, to return to our venerable friend. Having finished his religious ceremonies, he cautiously put out his leg, and touched the ocean with his big toe, drawing it back again rapidly as if it had been bitten. Gradually, however, after feeling the Atlantic several times in the manner I have described, he boldly advanced, sideways, until his knees were almost covered, and then commenced to kick about with wonderful vigour and pluck. Meanwhile his friend, a much younger man, came bounding like an Arab over the sand with every appearance of daring and spirit. I expected to see him plunge boldly in, but he stopped suddenly, and called out to his friend who was showing off by lying face downwards in the water, and feigning to be out of depth. "Is there any ground there, Pat, me boy?" The bald-headed juvenile spluttered out, "Come in, don't be afraid. I'll take care of ye, Tim, if ye can't swim." I was greatly astonished with Tim, who looked at the commencement as if he were going to swim to America, but who was evidently even a greater coward than Pat. He, however, after shivering for a few minutes, and scratching his head in a troubled fashion, entered the water in the following extraordinary manner. At each step he jerked his foot up as if he were treading on nettles; and when a wave came he jumped over it, with a loud yell of defiance at the ocean, as much as to say, "I'm the boy to jump the waves for ye!" At length they stood together and splashed one another like children—never going beyond their knees, and frequently casting suspicious glances at the horizon, as if they suspected the Atlantic had sinister designs, and ought to be closely watched. I went away feeling perfectly sure that these bathers were in no danger, and that they were not likely to be guilty of any daring or reckless conduct.

The innocence and ingenuousness of these 'Owlishers afford certain sea-faring characters about Youghal with good opportunities for imposition; and I was much amused by a pilot, named "Darby," who was a splendid hand at galling these poor people. Darby was a stout squat man, with a tough-looking bronzed face and a small pair of merry brown eyes, peering from under the shaggiest of eyebrows. He spent the days wandering about the hills facing the sea with an enormous telescope under his arm with which to descry the ships bound for Youghal. As the Youghal shipping trade is by no means extensive or important, Darby had an easy time of it, which he spent in the easiest possible manner, viz., he slept—only waking to tell lies or yarns to the 'Owlishers. I had the good fortune to meet Darby one lovely day on the hills, and spent some time in his company.

"You see, sur," he said, in reply to an inquiry, "dere ain't many ships wants pilots 'bout here; so I finds it difficult to pick up a livin'. De only ting I misses is de piece of baccy. Tank 'e, sur. I likes stronger stuff den dat. I'd as soon smoke hay as grass-cut or birds'-eye—'tisn't fit for a man, and dere's many a woman I knows in de town would turn up dere nose at it. Yes, dem 'Owlishers are queer people; dey know nothing at all—de're as ignorant as children. Dey've got no eddication whatever, an' lookin' at dere solemn faces you'd think dey were as wise as de priest. Dere's wan of dem on da strand dis moment—just look."

I looked through the glass, and saw a man standing on the shore in puris naturalibus. He had a large sponge attached to a piece of string, which he flung into the tide, drawing it in again, and sponging himself; thus avoiding the dangers of the deep and having all the advantage of a dip in the salt water.

"Here's some of dem comin' up de hill, sur. I declare dey'll believe anyting a man tells 'em. Just see.—'Good mornin', gentlemen,'" said Darby, turning to three countrymen who approached us.

"Good mornin', an' God save ye kindly, gentlemen," replied the 'Owlishers, seating themselves beside Darby.

"Is that a spy-glass?" asked one, pointing to the telescope.

"'Tis—an' wan of de best in de world—barrin' none," replied Darby, proudly.

"Will ye let us have a 'spy,' sur?" asked the youngest of the party.

"Wid all de pleasure in life," replied Darby. "But as it belongs to a company, I has to charge a trifle for looking tru' it."

There was a short pause, during which the 'Owlishers exchanged several nudges and winks. At length one said:

"Is it the same price for wan as two or three?"

"Dear me, no, sur. I makes a reduction when der's a party."

"What will ye give us a spy 'ach for?" asked the spokesman of the 'Owlishers.

"Well, if ye promises not to look very hard, I'll charge only a penny a head. Of course ye must only look wid wan eye at a time, an' den please don't scratch de glass wid yer eyelash."

The money was paid to Darby. He then in a very solemn and grave manner unscrewed the glass, and commenced brushing and rubbing the various parts with much ceremony.

"Dis was de glass dat discovered America," he said. "Christopher Columbus couldn't see land till he looked tru' it. De company dat it belongs to now paid tree tousand pounds for it; so you're in luck's way dis mornin', gentlemen," he said, turning to one of the countrymen, and handing him the glass.

The man after several trials got the right focus, and carefully shutting one eye, he looked through with the other.

"What's them black things rowling about the say?" he asked Darby, with reference to a number of porpoises which were gamboling at the mouth of the harbour.

"Can ye see dere legs, sur?" asked Darby, innocently.

"No," replied the countryman.

"Den dere only torpedoes placed dere by de Protestants."

"O i my!" exclaimed the 'Owlisher, as he caught sight of a large steamer that was passing. "There's a mighty big ship, with chimneys out of her like a house."

"Dat's a Fenian cruiser, sur," said Darby, "looking out for de English Fleet. God help de English Admiral if dey catch him." And so on, with each of the countrymen, who seemed to believe every word that Darby uttered. I moved away, having had sufficient evidence of Darby's capacity to impose in the most glaring manner on the credulity of his countrymen.

I spent some days roaming about the neighbourhood of Youghal, and was delighted with the scenery and the various interesting localities which lie near the old town. The River Blackwater—called the Irish Rhine—is one of the most picturesque rivers in Europe; and a trip from Youghal to Cappoquin would well repay the most exacting tourist for his trouble. Then the cliffs around Ardmore afford an opportunity of seeing rock scenery that cannot be surpassed. To any one who has been in the habit of visiting Ramsgate, Margate, and those other noisy sea-side resorts, a visit to Youghal during the summer months would form a most beneficent change. There you can enjoy the quiet and repose of the country, with all the advantages of an excellent watering-place.

MICHAEL BARRY

SEAMEN AT CHURCH.——The Convocation of Canterbury, reporting upon the spiritual provision of English seamen, states that "perhaps the greatest present need of our men-of-war's men is on shore, rather than at sea. Much is done in seaboard parishes to counteract the good influence operating amongst men-of-war's men when on shipboard; and on the other hand much might be done in seaboard parishes to carry on the good work of the Church afloat by inviting seamen when on shore to participate in the ordinary ministrations of the Church. This is already done with good effect where the men are able to reside with their families on shore; but there does not appear to be any system prevalent of bringing to church men-of-war's men temporarily resident at sailors' homes and lodging-houses, and ports where they are strangers. For lack of such welcome by the Church, the more serious men often resort to Nonconformist places of worship, whilst too many give up on shore the worship they are wont to offer when at sea.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. R. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. Parker. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The gloomiest reader will find some parts of it hearty enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 20 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

AUTUMN SEASON, 1877.

AS A CATERER for Public Patronage, I again beg to announce that my List for the Autumn Season is now complete. Few London Traders are in a position to submit the selection I offer to the Public, and no one surpasses me for variety, good taste, and excellent value. I have a splendid selection of Dress Materials, suitable for all purposes and any position in life. It would be quite impossible to enumerate the mass of patterns that represent my stock; I will content myself by mentioning just a few of the most notable goods and the regulation dress fabrics, such as Merinos, Cashmeres, Velveteens, &c., of which every lady knows the intrinsic value. In these goods I claim Cashmeres and Merinos as my Speciality, and feel justified in saying I can defy every Trader in England to touch me either for Quality, Colour, or Value.

JAMES CHAPMAN, Notting Hill.

BLACK SILKS.

RICH THICK CORDED Gros Grains, 4s. 11d. per yard, superb in colour and finish, equal in value to those usually sold at 7s. 11d. with as much appearance as Messrs. BONNETS' at 15s. per Yard. WILL WEAR as well as any Silk than can be bought at the same price in England, but Ladies must not confound them with my celebrated IMPERIAL Silks, which are altogether a different manufacture.

JAPANESE SILKS.

THE MOST EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT IN LONDON TO SELECT FROM.

In consequence of the depreciation in the value of silk, I am compelled to reduce the whole of my Japanese Stock very nearly to what they cost me. The new tariff is as under:

Brilliant quality . . . 1s. 11½d. per yard.
The richest quality made . . 2s. 3½d. "

VELVETEENS.

The great favour already accorded to Velveteens this season is a sufficient indication of their popularity, and no wonder! For what with their extreme usefulness combined with the handsome and rich appearance which is the distinguishing feature of these highly finished goods, they form a costume which is matchless at the price. In Coloured Velveteens the new winter shades look most superb, and in Blacks. This beautiful fabric is better than ever, having quite a regal effect. Prices 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 5s. 6d. per yard.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES'

(AS WORN BY H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES).

Alpaca has always been a favourite dress material, and it certainly has not lost its popularity during the last few years. Since I had the good fortune to introduce the celebrated Danish Silk-Finished Tinted Alpacas to the public, the annual sale has more than trebled. The manufacture is brought to such perfection that for many purposes Alpaca is used in place of Silk. Imitations of it are numerous, but not one has ever been made to compare with the genuine article for brilliancy and lightness. The most perfect and by far the largest assortment to select from in the metropolis. Over fifty new tinted shades, any length cut, 1s. 11½d. per yard, 28 inches wide.

FRENCH CASHMERE.

It is legitimate to suppose when so many imitations are produced of one special fabric, that the material itself should be perfection; and, correctly speaking, that is the only word that will convey an idea of the French Cashmere I now advertise. It is really quite perfect—in colour, in quality, in value, in effect—in everything that goes to make up a beautiful dress. They are specially dyed to match my silks, and cannot fail to elicit unqualified admiration. 46 in. wide, 3s. 3d. per yard.

FINEST FRENCH MERINOS

(INDIA CASHMERE FINISH).

Are better than ever, finer, purer. The dyes, if possible, are more perfect. In one colour I have no less than eleven shades, all clear, distinct tones. The patterns of these highly finished goods are alone sufficient to tempt one to buy. They convey the idea of a pretty dress immediately you see them. The sale I had for these goods last season was so immense that, anticipating an equally large, if not larger, demand this year, I have secured an unlimited supply from the chief French houses in Roubaix, covering the whole winter season, which will, I think, enable me to execute every order I receive, so that I shall not have the annoyance of being compelled to decline the patronage of any lady. 44 in. wide, 2s. 11½d. per yard.

ALBATROSS CLOTH.

These truly exquisite cloths, "having no admixture of Cotton or Silk, thereby rendering them quite impervious to rain, sun, or sea-water," are the most stylish plain woollen fabrics it has ever been my fortune to buy. I recommend them with great confidence, feeling certain that they will give unlimited satisfaction. 30 in. wide, 1s. 11d. per yard.

CAMEL HAIR CLOTH.

A most notable looking Fabric. One of the charms of this novelty is the weight; for though its appearance would suggest it being excessively thick and heavy, it is so light that a length of 20 yards weighs less than 6 lb. For promenade and out-door Costumes it will be a leading favourite. 26 in. wide, 2s. 9d. per yard.

SNOWFLAKE TWEED.

The white thread that is woven in little uneven patches across the Tweed is the origin of its name, and will convey some idea of its appearance. When judiciously combined with the plain cloth, this Tweed makes up most effectively; and being very inexpensive, it will undoubtedly prove a most desirable dress to ladies who are not disposed to give much money for their requirements. 26 in. wide, 1s. 6½d. per yard.

SERGES.

If anything new could be said respecting Serges, the set of patterns now before me would most certainly enable me to do so. The variety seems unlimited, and the various prices, ranging from 6¾d. to 3s. 11d. per yard, will meet the requirements of all classes. Twelve yards of Serge, costing 6s. 9d., is a marvel of cheapness and durability, and, if space permitted, I could eulogize each quality on its merits, until I am afraid my readers would get tired of reading them.

SAXONY WOOL.

No Costume could be prettier than one made of fine closely-woven Saxony wool. It is highly dressed, and looks like a faced cloth, and when trimmed with the arabesque galloons that are now so fashionable, is in perfect taste. Some beautiful shades in light browns will be found in this range of patterns. 26 in. wide, 1s. 6½d. per yard.

FRENCH TWILLED FLANNELS.

Twilled Flannels is now a recognised Material for Dresses, and very pretty and useful they are. For Winter Wear, the Double Milled Goods are recommended as being extra warm, particularly for children. The novel tones of colour that are fashionable this season have all been produced in these beautiful goods, the rich shades of orange and the favourite Mandarin being conspicuously noticeable. Some exquisite shades of Drab will merit attention. All are perfectly fast colours. 30 in. wide, 1s. 11½d. per yard.

THE GEM.

"I was quite surprised to find it was only 1s. per yard, it really looks worth 2s." was a remark passed upon this very cloth the other day by a lady; and in my experience I have always found ladies very keen judges of dress goods. I don't doubt but it will be the verdict of the general public, for it is very neat and very good.

HALF-A-SOVEREIGN FOR A FRENCH-WOVE CORSET.

Richly embroidered in every gore, also entirely down front. A beautiful specimen of French workmanship. Admirably suited for the present cuirasse bodices, being a deep corset with spoon busk. Size of waist only requisite. Forwarded to any part of the Kingdom on receipt of P.O.O.

SKIRTINGS.

Now that every dress is made of a plain material, and more or less looped up, the under skirt becomes as much a matter of consideration and importance as the outer dress. To meet this necessity, manufacturers have produced some most striking and effective materials for the purpose. Some have a multiplicity of fine lines, making a complete and pleasing whole, while others are quite simple, with broad black stripes a couple of inches or more wide. There are many styles, suitable for all tastes. The patterns, unfortunately, fail to convey an adequate idea of these goods, but my customers will allow for that. In all cases it must be remembered the stripes go longitudinally; 45 in. wide. Prices 1s. 11½d., 2s. 11½d., 3s. 11½d., and 4s. 11½d. per yard.

COMPLETE SETS OF PATTERNS FORWARDED TO ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE SAME DAY AS RECEIPT OF ORDER.

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed-for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will entirely do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

JASON ROTHA,
Vanity Fair, March 17, 1877.

MARSHAL MACMAHON'S MANIFESTO.——It is difficult to believe that there are many Frenchmen who approve the manifesto Marshal MacMahon has just addressed to the nation. A more insolent and foolish document has rarely been written. It was of course to be expected that he would defend the policy he has pursued, and exalt his services to France. But he has gone far beyond this. He has had the audacity to tell the electors the precise character of the representatives whom they must send to Versailles. They are free, he assures them, to do as they like; but at the same time they must do exactly what he tells them. Only good Conservatives must be chosen to aid him in the task of governing France. If France replies by choosing Radicals, the Marshal will not resign his office, nor will he submit to the dictation of the majority; he will continue his present policy, maintaining in this singular manner the Constitution he was appointed to defend. The most curious element of the Manifesto is the anxiety he professes respecting the Constitution. As if the object of the Constitution were not to secure that the nation shall decide its own destinies! The Marshal makes the most extraordinary fuss about upholding a system through which he is in the very act of driving a coach-and-six. Who, then, is the man that thus ventures to defy a great people? The contrast between his pretensions and his merits would be highly comic if he were not unfortunately the master of many legions, and therefore able to do an incalculable amount of mischief. The temptation to the Republicans to resent violently his despotic temper will be very great; but it is to be hoped they will have the courage to act with even more moderation than they have lately displayed. We cannot believe that France will allow herself to be made the sport of a soldier who is controlled by a set of selfish intriguers. She will answer his impertinent appeal, it is to be hoped, with a decision that will make him hesitate to enter upon the conflict for which he declares himself prepared. Should she submit to his dictation, she will forfeit the sympathy of nearly the whole of cultivated Europe.

EXPLOSIVES ON BOARD SHIP.——Most of our readers will recollect the case of the Great Queensland. This vessel sailed for Melbourne on the 5th August last year, with sixty-nine persons on board. She was spoken in the mouth of the Channel on the 12th August, since which time nothing has been heard of her. Some wreckage, however, drifted ashore shortly afterwards, and there can be little doubt that she was lost in the neighbourhood of Cape Finisterre. She was a sound ship, well found, well manned, and in good trim; there is no reason to suppose that she met with any bad weather, but she had on board as part of her cargo thirty tons of ordinary black gunpowder, and two tons of what is known as "patent safety blasting powder." After a prolonged inquiry, aided by the evidence of skilled witnesses, the Wreck Commissioner has come to the conclusion that this latter description of powder was of very dangerous quality, exceedingly liable to self-combustion, and that, in all probability, the loss of the Great Queensland was due to its explosion. The question then arises—who was responsible for this dreadful disaster? Mr. Rothery exonerates the Patent Gunpowder Company, because he holds that they adequately described the nature of the goods which they shipped, while he refrains from passing any opinion on the conduct of the owners of the Great Queensland in taking such hazardous goods on board their vessel. It is plain, from this decision, that the whole subject of the carriage of explosive substances by sea demands special investigation. Already, such merchandise is liable to certain restrictions of transit, for Government forbids the shipment of gunpowder or similar hazardous materials on board vessels technically described as emigrant ships. Would it not be possible to go further, and, at all events as far as our colonies are concerned, confine the carriage of such goods to a special service of vessels expressly fitted for the purpose? The cargo on board these vessels would necessarily be stowed under special inspection, and in this manner liability to accidents might be greatly diminished.

THE TWO CHANCELLORS.——Considerable interest has been aroused by the meeting of Count Andrassy and Prince Bismarck. There are not two men on the Continent who, if they chose, might exercise so powerful an influence on the progress of events, and there was something dramatic in the contrast between the circumstances in which they came together and those by which it was some time ago believed they would now be surrounded. It may, however, be doubted whether the conference resulted in anything beyond the confirmation of the policy on which both statesmen had already resolved. The broad outlines of that policy are pretty well understood. Both will be perfectly willing to help the restoration of peace when the proper moment arrives, but in the meantime they will content themselves with the rôle of spectators. There are politicians who still suppose that the Triple Alliance represented a genuine combination of the three Empires for certain great purposes. If this view was right, we might expect to see some intervention on the part both of Austria and Germany in favour of Russia. But, as a matter of fact, the Germans as a nation have no sympathy with Russian aims. Like the rest of the world they detest Turkish tyranny, but they do not think that the remedy for that is to set up another tyranny in its place. And they have so long been in the habit of dreading a future alliance of Russia with France that they have felt no very profound sorrow at the blows so unexpectedly dealt by the Turks at their invaders. The plain truth is that the more Russia is weakened the more confident Germany may be in regard to her own future. The majority of the Austrians have even stronger reason to be gratified at the undermining of Russian influence, for the success of Russia in South-Eastern Europe would probably mean the disintegration of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. Hence the rejoicings of the Magyars at the triumphs of the Turks. We may, therefore, be tolerably sure that, however the war may go, Russia will receive no effective aid from either Austria or Germany. She may be condoled with, and there may be a plentiful supply of pious ejaculations respecting Ottoman wickedness; but no practical help will be rendered. Probably the utmost that Prince Bismarck and Count Andrassy did was to assure each other that, although the Triple Alliance is all very well in its way, it must not be supposed to have any particular meaning, or to involve a single definite obligation.

THE AMERICAN RAILWAY RIOTS.——Colonel Scott, a railway official of long experience, and at present the President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, has done good service in calling the attention of his countrymen to the recent railway disturbances, and in suggesting practical safeguards against their repetition. Like ourselves, the Americans dislike the interference of the Central Government in local matters, and this anti-centralisation sentiment is all the more strongly felt on the other side of the Atlantic, because each State, unlike our counties, constitutes a real sovereignty in itself. Had the Fathers of the Republic, however, when framing the Constitution, foreseen that their country would be covered by a network of iron highways, traversed by steam-horses, and that obstruction or damage to any part of this system would tend to the disorganisation of the remainder, they would probably have regarded railways as an exceptional kind of property, and have placed them under the special protection of Uncle Sam. This is just what Colonel Scott demands. Piracy by sea, he says, or on the lakes, would be speedily taken in hand by the authorities at Washington; but piracy, or what amounts to piracy, by land is left to local management; and so, while the Mayor of the City was waiting for the Sheriff of the County, and the Sheriff of the County was appealing to the Governor of the State, the sky of Pittsburg was lurid with rebellious fires, many lives were sacrificed, trade was paralysed, and millions of dollars' worth of property destroyed. The most fortunate railways during this terrible crisis were those which were bankrupt, for they, being already under Government control, were efficiently guarded by the Federal authorities. And now a word on another aspect of the same subject. The vast immigration of the last thirty years has caused the United States to grow rich and powerful with a rapidity far beyond European precedent; but it has brought with it two serious evils. First, many of the immigrants were quite unfitted for American political institutions, which were intended for an educated, self-controlled people. Secondly—and, perhaps, still more serious—the native Americans left off hard manual labour. The European immigrant was to the Northerner what the negro was to the Southerner. Hence, as we have already pointed out, the exceeding bitterness of the recent outbreak. Employers and employed were alien to each other. It would be a wholesome thing for the United States if much of the immigration which flows thither were to cease for fifty years or so, until the present colluvies gentium had become fused into a homogeneous whole.

WORKMEN AND ARBITRATION.——The speech with which Mr. Merrick opened the Trades Union Congress at Leicester was marked by a singularly fair and liberal tone. We do not wonder that he somewhat resented the manner in which Mr. Bright, in his recent speech at Manchester, alluded to trades unions. Notwithstanding his many services to the present generation, Mr. Bright has never been in full sympathy with the deepest tendencies of the working classes. He has fought nobly to secure their political rights, but he has done little for the improvement of their lot in regard to wages and hours of labour. In the speech to which we refer he manifested a jealous spirit which does not surprise us in narrow-minded employers, but is very surprising in so great and generous a statesman. The trades unions may have done harm in their time, but they have also done a great deal of good, and workmen are quite right in maintaining them as a means of appealing to the last argument in case of a hopeless dispute. At the same time, it must be allowed that the last argument should be appealed to as seldom as possible. So much misery arises from strikes on a great scale, that they should be resolved upon only when every other method of obtaining what is demanded has failed. We are, therefore, very glad that Mr. Merrick dwelt with evident pleasure on the advantages of arbitration. He seemed to think that masters alone dislike arbitration, but it is only fair to remember that, while they have hitherto always accepted the awards of the umpire, trades unions have repeatedly declined to accept his judgment. This does not indicate a very clear understanding of the conditions of arbitration; and Mr. Merrick and others of his way of thinking would do well to make some attempt to enlighten workmen on the subject. If arbitration, conducted on proper principles, became general, the industry of the country would enter upon a new era. It would help to bring about the general elevation of the working classes, without that class bitterness which, unfortunately, attends the process at present, and is one of the chief dangers against which the nation will have to contend in the immediate future.

CEYLON.——Even when it is not paralysed by the acts of deliberate Obstructives, our Parliament accomplishes so little in the way of useful legislation that we sometimes sigh for a benevolent despotism, where there would be less talkee-talkee, and more action. Such a state of affairs is shadowed forth in Sir W. H. Gregory's attractive survey of his five years' administration of the government of Ceylon. Ceylon, is, to our fancy, a more interesting place than India. It is small enough and compact enough to be grasped intellectually; whereas India is so vast, and inhabited by such varied races, that a life-time of observation would scarcely suffice for it. Then Ceylon is styled a colony, which seems to place it in the same category with Canada and Australia, though few white immigrants repair to its shores except the enterprising Guernsey men, who probably form the majority among its coffee-planters. Again, the climate is pleasanter and healthier than that of the mainland. Though nearer the Equator than India, the heat is moderated by the surrounding ocean, while hills and mountains are so numerous that a few hours' climbing places the European in a climate akin to his own. The tale which Sir W. H. Gregory has to tell is especially pleasant to hear at a time when, in other countries equally highly favoured by Nature, men are striving their utmost to inflict mutual misery and destruction. Railways and irrigation works are advancing; Colombo is expected to become a great commercial port when the breakwater is completed; schools are looking up, and are much appreciated by the quick-witted natives; forests are being preserved; and steps are being taken to prevent the extermination of that most valuable tropical quadruped, the elephant. A scheme for connecting the island with the mainland by means of a railway across the singular chain of islets known as Adam's Bridge is pronounced to be by no means visionary; and altogether we may believe with a clear conscience that our possession of Ceylon has been a benefit to the native population.

THE SITE OF CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.——There is a curious diversity of opinion as to the position in which the obelisk now on its way to this country may be best displayed. The subject has been discussed for some weeks; but no single proposal commands general approval. It is, indeed, possible that the front of Greenwich Hospital would be adopted if it were nearer London; but the distance is conclusive against the suggestion. Parliament Square will obviously not do, since the bulk and height of the surrounding buildings would quite destroy the effect of the "Needle." Park Crescent, which has also been proposed, is too much out of the way; and although the area in front of Buckingham Palace is not unsuitable, there is no particular reason for putting it there rather than in any one of half-a-dozen other places. For ourselves, we should prefer to all other sites the space before the British Museum. There would be perfect fitness in its association with the building which contains so splendid a collection of the remains of ancient Art; and in the fine open ground every "point" of the Obelisk would be seen at its best. It is said that there are insuperable difficulties in the way of transport; but surely such a problem would not be beyond the resources of engineering science. Should this idea be abandoned, we agree with Mr. Bonomi, of the Soane Museum, in recommending the Northumberland Avenue site. Here the monument would be seen from many different directions; and it would be easily set up. The railway station and bridge in the neighbourhood are not attractive works; but Mr. Bonomi points out that they "present at least horizontal lines, and thus coincide with the general laws applying to such monuments and the buildings with which they were connected." We hope, however, that before a decision is arrived at the opinion of the very highest authorities will be taken. The chance of adorning our smoky capital is too good not to be taken advantage of to the utmost possible extent.

ANGLICANISM AMONG THE ALPS.——Human nature loves contrasts, and it is a positive relief, at a time when the newspapers are filled with accounts of gigantic frauds, of famines, of shipwrecks, and of a most bloody, desolating war, to turn to a small grievance. The grievance is this, as stated by a correspondent of the Times. Those creations of modern luxury, the hotels upon the Swiss mountains, are none too roomy for their guests during the tourists' months. Often every bed is occupied, and travellers are glad to sleep either on or under the saloon dining-table. It is Saturday night, let us suppose, you have done a biggish day's work—figuratively speaking, you have cut several fresh notches on your alpenstock—and you are looking forward to a prolonged slumber on the Sunday morning. No such luck, however. At what you deem an absurdly early hour you are ousted from your perch by a peremptory waiter, who informs you, in the choice polyglot of the Eggischhorn, that an Englischer Pfarrer has need of the salle à manger, and that you must budge. The real meaning of this is that there is to be an early celebration of the Holy Communion—our informant says at the sole bidding of three Ritualistic young ladies—and that the room must be prepared accordingly. As, besides this, two regular services are held at the orthodox hours of 11 and 3, the hotel guests are deprived of this, their only sitting room, during the greater part of the Sunday. The grievance is, as we have said, a very small one, still it affords a good example of the self-complacent John Bullism of many of our countrymen, who, when abroad, are apt to act on the principle that everything ought to give way to their convenience, and that whatever is not English is wrong. Next year we hope these enthusiastic worshippers will avoid interfering with the comfort of other guests, and will follow the example of the Apostles by selecting an upper chamber, that is to say, the most spacious bedroom they can find.

THE WAR.

THE GRAPHIC.

So large a number of interesting Illustrations relating to the War, more particularly of the BATTLES now raging at PLEVNA and the SHIPKA PASS, are daily arriving from our Artists with the Russians and the Turks, that it is found impossible to afford space for them in the Ordinary Numbers of THE GRAPHIC.

It has been determined, therefore, to issue these Sketches in the form of a GRAND EXTRA DOUBLE NUMBER, consisting of three whole sheets, a Bird's-eye View of the Seat of War, printed in three colours, showing the Russian and Turkish positions, and the parts of Bulgaria occupied by the Russians and now retaken by the Turks, and an illustrated cover. The letterpress has been especially written for this Number, and will comprise a full and succinct account of the great battles which have recently taken place.

The intense excitement now attaching to this terrible struggle will be certain to create a great demand for this Number, which will be complete in itself, and full of ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS of the utmost fidelity. It would be advisable, therefore, to give early orders to the Newsagent in order to ensure the delivery of this special issue.

READY WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 26. PRICE ONE SHILLING.

OFFICE: 190, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

NOTICE.——The Half-Sheet this week, though delivered in the middle of the paper, must be placed for binding between pages 276 and 285.

Our Illustrations

WITH THE TURKS

THE titles of the four illustrations in our front page are self-explanatory. The first sketch portrays the cautious movements of the advanced troop of Cossacks which invariably precede the main body of an advancing army, and occupy the villages on the line of march.

"A Dummy Regiment" depicts a regiment of foot Cossacks having an hour's amusement at the expense of their adversaries. The men themselves were safely hidden behind a hill, but had dressed up a row of sticks in their bourkas or cloaks, and topped with their Circassian head-gear. The Turks pounded away at this dummy regiment for a whole hour to the intense enjoyment of the Circassians, whose little joke, however, came somewhat expensive, as no fewer than sixty bourkas were destroyed by the Turkish fire.

"Another Bulgarian Atrocity" represents a Russian soldier receiving condign punishment at the hands of a sturdy Bulgarian woman from whose little store he had essayed to filch a water melon.

The capture of a Turkish major by a Cossack reminds one rather of a scene on the prairies of Western America than an incident on the plains of Bulgaria. Some of the Cossacks, however, accustomed to the roving life of the Russian steppes, are as great adepts in the use of the lasso as the most skilful Mexican cattle-lifter, and, as we see in the sketch, when occasion offers, put their skill to a practical use. The incident occurred at the taking of Medjidie in the Dobrudscha.

BEFORE PLEVNA—A CAVALRY RECONNAISSANCE

THIS sketch represents a cavalry skirmish before Plevna on the 30th of last August, on the eve of what Mr. Forbes calls "the third battle of Plevna." Beyond the fact that the Turks were repulsed after a sharp encounter, there is little to remark except that the troops engaged were on the one side Russian Hussars, and on the other Circassian irregulars.

FROM ISLAM TO THE LAND OF THE GIAOUR

HERE we have a convoy of Turkish prisoners, consisting both of Bashi-Bazouks and regulars, being marched under an escort of the ever useful Cossacks to Russia, where they would be interned until the end of the war secures their release. From present appearances, however, it seems as if they were likely to enjoy the hospitality of the land of vodka and samovars for some time to come.

WITH THE RUSSIANS—THE CAPTURE OF LOVATZ

ON Sept. 3, a few days after the Russians had resumed their advance upon Plevna, a determined attempt was made by Prince Imeretinsky and Generals Dobrovolski and Skobeleff to take the town of Lovatz or Loftcha. This town is situated to the south-east of Plevna, in a small plain surrounded on all sides by mountains. These heights were occupied by the Turks, and on two of them strong redoubts had been constructed. Operations began early in the morning, and by ten o'clock the heights on the right of the town had been taken. General Skobeleff then devoted himself to storming a ridge running from south-east to north-west, where the Turks had strongly entrenched themselves. Thanks to a tremendous shell fire from the artillery, and to the enthusiastic charges of the infantry, the attack succeeded shortly after noon, and, with the exception of a large redoubt which formed the key of the western side, all the Turkish positions were in the hands of the Russians. The Russians then opened a tremendous artillery fire upon the redoubt, and, after several hours' bombardment, charged the height furiously, and notwithstanding the stubborn resistance of the Turks, who preferred to die rather than surrender, gained possession of the position at the point of the bayonet. A few minutes afterwards the firing ceased, and the Russians definitively occupied the town. Of the two sketches above this illustration, one represents a Turkish rejoicing after a victory, where the officers join together and brew the "djonka," a species of punch composed of champagne, brandy, red wine, burnt sugar, and fruit. The burning sugar throws a weird light on all the faces around, while the effect is heightened by the mixture being stirred with a bright steel bayonet. The other sketch represents a batch of journalistic correspondents caught in bad weather.

THE MANCHESTER NEW TOWN HALL

THIS noble building, which has been some ten years in course of erection, and has cost the corporation of the city 800,000*l.*, stands upon a triangular site to the south-west of Albert Square. The design is Gothic, and the architect, Mr. Waterhouse, was chosen, after an open competition, from amongst no fewer than 136 competitors. The three sides of the triangle are respectively—Albert Square, 328 feet; Princess Street, 387 feet; and Lloyd Street, 350 feet; the whole area containing 8,648 square yards. The principal front is in Albert Square, and its most striking feature is the central tower, which is 280 feet high, 36 feet square, and is divided into six storeys, independent of the belfry. In the tower is placed a fine peal of twenty-one bells, cast by Messrs. Taylor, of Loughborough, as well as a great clock and carillons, supplied by Messrs. Gillett and Bland, of Croydon. This clock strikes the hours upon a bell of seven tons, and chimes the quarters on eight bells, and has an electric connection with Greenwich. The carillon plays thirty-one tunes on seventeen bells, weighing altogether about thirty tons, and also has barrels for changes similar to ringing a peal, besides a key-board, so that any musician can play tunes upon the bells with the fingers as easily as upon a pianoforte or an organ. Taken altogether, this is said to be the largest work of the kind in the United Kingdom. The seven-ton hour-bell will be the largest struck upon by a clock in this country except that at Westminster.

The building comprises a number of council chambers, banquetting, reception and ante-rooms, besides offices for the various departments of municipal business, and in the centre is a great public hall, which contains a fine organ and some admirable marble busts of Her Majesty, the late Prince Consort, and the Prince and Princess of Wales. The ceiling is panelled, and each division is filled with the arms of various towns and cities connected with the staple trade of Manchester.

At each corner of the triangular plan is a circular staircase, giving access to the corridors which communicate with the numerous rooms and offices. These staircases are built respectively of English, Irish, and Scotch granite, and are named accordingly. The exterior of the building is ornamented with sculpture illustrative of the history of Manchester, and in one of the apartments is a fine bust of Cromwell, who granted its first charter to the town.

The opening ceremonies on Thursday last week were very simple. The Mayor, Aldermen, and other civic dignitaries walked in procession from the old Town Hall to the new one, the door of which was opened with a golden key. Then came an address of congratulation from the Town Council, and the reply of the Mayor closed the formalities. The town was decked out with bunting and flowers, and although the weather was wet the crowd of spectators was large and enthusiastic. In the evening there was a banquet in the large room of the new Hall, at which Mr. Bright was naturally the chief speaker. The inaugural festivities were kept up for three days. On the Friday the Mayor held a reception, at which Mrs. Heywood, the Mayoress, was presented with an album containing portraits of all the members and officers of the Corporation, and there was a ball in the evening. On Saturday there was a great working-class demonstration: a procession some six miles in length, and consisting of representatives of sixty-four trade and friendly societies, marched through the gaily decorated streets to Albert Square, where it was received by the Mayor and Corporation. Processionists and spectators then divided themselves into three large groups, which made their way respectively to the Pomona

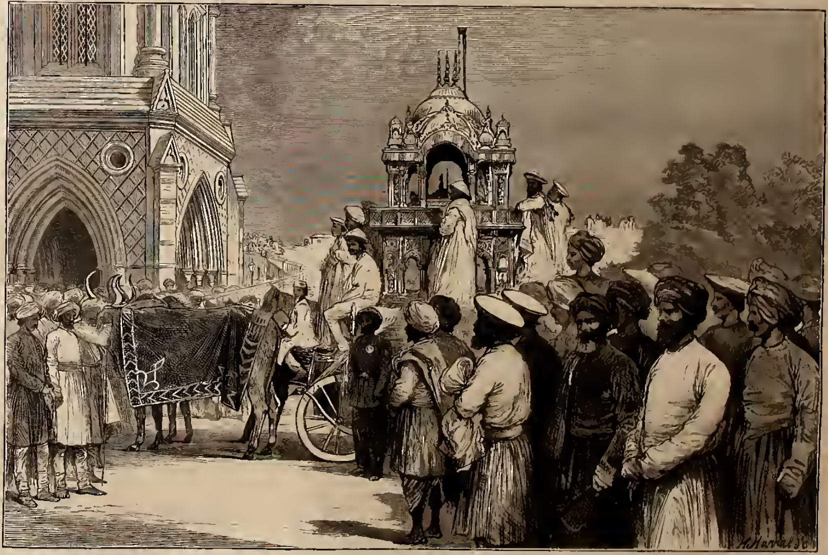
CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE IN TOW OFF ALEXANDRIA



INDIA—A SAROGI IDOL AND ITS GOLDEN CAR

Gardens, Manley Park, and Belle Vue Gardens, at each of which places special amusements were provided.

THE EGYPTIAN OBELISK AFLOAT!

On the 7th September the movement of the cylinder, begun on the 28th August, recommenced, the tugs to seaward steamed ahead, the hawsers tightened, and bit by bit it moved into deep water, the work becoming easier as the mass became more and more waterborne. Shortly before eleven in the forenoon the final move was made, when the cylinder, after making a portion of a turn more rapidly than before, was observed to rise and fall with the swell coming in from the Mediterranean, showing unmistakeably that it was at last afloat.

Shortly after the wooden casing was stripped off, and amid the cheers of the crowds that lined the shore the strange craft was taken in tow by the two tugs, one ahead and the other astern (for steering purposes), and taken round to the harbour. During the voyage, a distance of nine miles, the cylinder behaved remarkably well, and showed that in spite of the heavy swell prevailing she was not wanting in stability.—The ceremony of christening the obelisk ship was performed on the 19th inst. by the Hon. H. C. Vivian, the British Diplomatic Agent.—Our engraving is from a sketch by Mr. Charles Royle, of Alexandria.

SAROGI IDOL AND GOLD CAR

The Sarogis and Jains are identical, and are closely related, if not identical, with the Buddhists. There is intense hatred between them and the Hindu sect called Vishnuvis. To such dimensions did the feud reach in Delhi that in the interests of peace the authorities were obliged to prohibit the annual procession of Idol and Car. For years the Sarogis have petitioned Government for the liberty enjoyed by every other sect—viz., that of publicly exhibiting their idol, and at last success has attended their efforts. Our engraving represents the procession in its progress through Chandni Chouk. It is halting for a few minutes for the advantage of the crowd of spectators, under the beautiful Clock Tower and opposite the Town Hall or Institute building. The occasion was one of great triumph and rejoicing among the Sarogis, who are the richest bankers and merchants of Delhi.

SKETCHES AT GREAT YARMOUTH

The sea-coast of East Anglia is wanting in some of the attractions which characterise the shores of the western and south-western counties. There are neither beetling precipices nor picturesque piles of rocks, and the adjacent inland scenery is apt to be tame and treeless. Per contra, there is a bracing quality in the air which is lacking in the soft and relaxing West, there is generally a good honest sandy or shingly beach, and the bathing is excellent. Anxious mammas, with children fond of climbing, will not regret the absence of precipices, as there is less fear of accidents from falls. Add to this one special attraction of the east coast, namely, that if you are an early riser the sun leaps from an ocean-bed, and sheds his genial horizontal rays on you as you bathe, while in the evening his departing effulgence reddens the sails of all the vessels in sight, and renders the seaward prospect especially attractive.

Among the east-coast watering places Yarmouth and Lowestoft are the best known. Lowestoft is deemed the most genteel, but Yarmouth is decidedly the most amusing. The wide extent of sand that lies between the Wellington and the Britannia piers is during the month of August completely dotted over with pleasure-seekers, who never need be in want of amusements. Itinerant vendors abound who will furnish them with cakes, apples, and sweetmeats; they can have their likenesses taken in ferrotype; they can listen to negro melodies or view performing dogs; or, lastly, they can, for the small sum of sixpence, embark on board one of the excellent sailing boats which abound on the beach, and gain an hour's experience of "life on the ocean wave." At night the piers are the centre of attraction, as there is generally a good band playing on one or both of them. Then the old town of Yarmouth itself is a picturesque and peculiar place, with its network of alleys or "rows," very narrow but scrupulously clean. The cart represented in one of our sketches is specially made for traversing these narrow thoroughfares. Altogether, there is a very Dutch aspect about Yarmouth and its neighbourhood, and a sail up the river Yare especially recals the "lowlands of Holland." Our other pictures are self-explanatory.

"CELIA'S ARBOUR"

A TABLE D'HÔTE AT THE DOGS' HOME

All lovers of dumb animals must rejoice to know that the lost and starving dogs of London are not now, as was formerly the case, left to shift for themselves and drag out a wretched and loathsome existence in the streets. This excellent institution was first established in 1860 by the late Mrs. Tealby, who, assisted by Mrs. Major and a number of other ladies, commenced operations in a small stable at Holloway, from whence it was afterwards removed to Battersea, where it is now worked in connection with an elaborate system of police supervision, all stray dogs being at once "run in," and, after two days' detention at the local police station, sent to the Home, where, if they are not claimed within a fortnight, they are sold or "otherwise disposed of," an euphemism which in plain English means put to death by poison, the carcases forming excellent manure. The number of dogs received per month varies from 1,200 to 1,500, out of which a proportion of about 200 are claimed and restored to their owners. All the very old and diseased dogs are destroyed, and it is a remarkable fact that among the many thousands of animals taken to the Home, there has not been one single instance of hydrophobia. The scene depicted in our sketch is one which may be witnessed daily at the "Home," and our artist has taken advantage of the peculiar idiosyncrasies of the different breeds to parody the characters which one meets with at a table d'hôte, where the guests are human instead of canine. There is, for example, the aristocratic greyhound, looking most disdainfully at the motley group in whose company he declines to feed. The two curs on the left, like a couple of ill-conditioned cads, are quarrelling over their meal, whilst the greedy gourmand bull-dog, all intent upon the business in hand, is making the most of his time. Others in the centre are struggling for a good position, and on the right is seated an inexperienced little puppy, who will probably get no dinner at all, being too timid to come forward. A rush of additional guests from the open doorway in the rear completes the picture.

ON THE PARIS BOULEVARDS—A CAFÉ

Most people who visit Paris for pleasure repair thither during the warmer months of the year, and of all the sights of the gay city none perhaps makes such an impression, both by daylight and gaslight, on the hitherto untravelled Englishman as the inner line of Boulevards. Here are to be found, in delightful combination, fascinating shop-windows, shady trees, abundance of seats, a broad roadway, and a most liberal breadth of territory allotted to pedestrians. In this semi-circular, or rather triangular, thoroughfare, which extends from the Column of July in the east to the Madeleine in the west, are to be found several of the theatres, while it is especially the region of cafés, many of which are of great size and magnificence. In winter the guests are obliged to keep indoors, but during the warmer season, say from May till November, they overflow the pavements in front of these establishments, and become in themselves one of the most noticeable features of Boulevard existence. Persons of both sexes and of all ages are to be seen here; and the liquids they consume are of the most variegated hues, ranging from the rich brown of coffee or chocolate to the scarlet of gooseberry syrup, the golden yellow of Chartreuse, and the deadly green of absinthe. But the Parisian cafés are not merely pleasure-resorts. Many of them serve as houses of call for persons of various trades and professions, and much serious business is transacted across these marble-topped tables. There is perhaps no big city in the world where business and pleasure are so delightfully intermingled as in Paris. For example, you see a man in his shirt-sleeves playing billiards during what in London are supposed to be the busiest hours of the day. This man is not necessarily an idle fellow, he is, let us say, an engineer, the house is frequented by brothers of the craft, who, after a substantial breakfast, are enjoying a temporary respite from their labours, and between the cannon strokes affairs of serious importance are often arranged. It is to be feared that the open-air café will never become popular in London, because, although less than 300 miles from Paris, our climate is so damp and chilly, and our atmosphere so laden with coal-smoke.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——There has been little or nothing of interest in home politics during the past week. Public attention has been absorbed by the daily record of terrible events from the seat of war in the East. New light has, however, been thrown on the correspondence of Mr. Gladstone on the relations of Greece and Turkey which recently attracted general attention. It appears from a letter which was published in Monday's Times by M. Negroponte, the recipient of Mr. Gladstone's letter on the subject, that in no sense whatever could Mr. Gladstone's words be taken as "endeavouring to incite the Greeks against Turkey," or "advising them to join with the Sclavs in fighting the Turks." Although the original letter which gave rise to the discussion is not made public, M. Negroponte denounces such allegations as "wholly unfounded, and an unworthy perversion of the truth." But whatever Mr. Gladstone's real opinion may be as to the wisdom or unwisdom of Greek interference in the present struggle he continues to give almost daily public proof that his bitterness against the Turk is tempered by no sweetness. Writing the other day on the subject of English sympathy with Turkey he says:—"The conduct in this matter of many persons of superior Christianity, and in particular of the majority of the clergy, as contrasted with that of the Nonconformists, will to my dying day be to me a subject of great grief and astonishment." To another correspondent who had surmised that three-fourths of the people of London are "madly in favour of the Turk and wildly denunciatory of the Russian," he says by way of accounting for the fact:—"The people of London, from deficient local institutions, have had less of political education than those of the country generally; and it is in London, too, that the evil influence of the money power is concentrated." Mr. Gladstone evidently finds it no easy task to keep pace with his correspondents. Endeavouring to pour balm upon the wounded susceptibilities of an offended Caithness-shire Baronet who a week ago threatened to resign his seat in Parliament on account of the snubbing he had to accept at the hands of the leaders of the Liberal party, Mr. Gladstone states, "I seldom have any period of real leisure," and emphatically denies that for his part he can any longer be reckoned "one of the leaders of the Liberal party."

Home Rule.——The more extreme members of the Home Rule Party held a demonstration at Kilmallock on Monday. Mr. Parnell was the hero of the occasion, supported by Mr. W. H. O'Sullivan, M.P., Major O'Gorman, M.P., &c. Mr. Parnell was welcomed by a large crowd at the station, escorted by three bands to the town, while arches and decorations adorned the way. At an open-air meeting the chief of the Obstructives was introduced as "one of Ireland's most true and faithful children." Mr. Parnell assured his audience amid cheers that they were inaugurating a fresh struggle between Ireland and England, which they would fight out like men. Not to conciliate, or beg or crave from England their rights was to be their future policy, but to demand these, and if need be compel a reform in the House of Commons. Major O'Gorman, replying to a toast on the same evening, declared "every Home Ruler and constituency would betray his country at the next election if he did not return the men that were found fault with by Sir Stafford Northcote." Mr. Butt, M.P., was not present at the demonstration, but wrote expressing regret at his inability to accept the invitation. He is expected to attend the meeting of Home Rule members of Parliament in Dublin at the beginning of next month.

The Collision in the Channel.——The hull of the Forest has been during the past week a source of considerable danger to passing ships. It has been drifting right in the course marked out on the chart. None of the attempts made to bring the vessel to port having succeeded, orders were given to destroy the bulk by torpedoes. During Tuesday and Wednesday the ironclad Defence, accompanied by steam pinnaces, with torpedo crews and torpedo instructors, steamed out from Portland Harbour for that purpose. But in spite of the explosion of barrels of gunpowder, lowered into the water at the side of and into the vessel, in addition to the discharge of three outrigger mines (which, by the way, took three hours to prepare), little visible effect was perceptible on the bulk. Large quantities of wreckage have been recovered. A subscription has been started at Weymouth for the benefit of the fishermen who went to the rescue of the twelve survivors during the storm last Wednesday week.

Trades Unions Congress.——The tenth annual Congress of Trades Unions was opened in Leicester on Monday. Many delegates from the various trade societies attended, representing nearly half a million working men. The inaugural address was delivered by the president, Mr. Merrick, who in dealing with the subject of strikes and lockouts declared that these methods of settling disputes, though at present justifiable and necessary, were really barbarous, and ought to give way to arbitration. Mr. Merrick took occasion to criticise sharply Mr. Bright's opinions on the subject of reduction of hours of labour of the working classes. Resolutions in favour of the Factory and Workshops Act Consolidation Bill, advocating reform of the jury system, were discussed. It was announced that Mr. Macdonald, M.P., means to reintroduce to Parliament a measure making employers responsible for the safety of their workmen.—It is expected that the dispute of six months' duration between the Clyde shipbuilders and their masters is about to terminate. The subject of difference has been referred to arbitration.

Miscellaneous.——Mr. Henry Compton, the inimitable interpreter of such characters as Dogberry, Touchstone, the Gravedigger, &c., died last Saturday at the age of seventy-three. He made his first appearance in London at the Lyceum Theatre in 1837, and at the same theatre, during the performance of Hamlet in 1874-5, he made his last public appearance. He was buried on Wednesday at Brompton Cemetery.—An unusual number of boating and bathing accidents are recorded. Last Friday a boat was upset on the river Tivy, and five persons belonging to the Collegiate School were drowned. On Saturday at Exeter, during a regatta, a schooner on which were more than a hundred spectators was overturned. About fifty people were thrown into the water, but of that number only one, a boy, lost his life. At Ramsgate on Monday, a visitor named Mr. Proctor was drowned while bathing, and his brother narrowly escaped a similar fate. The sea was rough at the time, and a boat which was launched to the rescue of the young men was swamped.—General Grant has been during the past week a visitor at Inverary Castle. A committee has been formed at Sheffield to make arrangements for his reception there. During his residence at Sheffield he will be the guest of the Mayor, and on his arrival at the railway station one more will be added to the already numerous list of addresses presented to him.—Sir Stafford Northcote was to have delivered the opening address of the autumn session of the Exeter Literary Society, of which he is president, yesterday (Friday).—The Queen's Dock, an important addition to the harbour accommodation of Glasgow, was formally opened by the Lord Provost on Tuesday. The new dock will cover when finished a surface of twenty-four acres, being 3,000 feet long, 700 feet broad, and twenty feet deep. The entire cost will be about 1,600,000*l*. During the opening ceremony the ships in the harbour were gaily decorated with flags.—On Tuesday the master, the wardens, and the Court of the Fruiterers' Company, according to custom, waited upon the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House, and presented him with a splendid assortment of the choicest fruits of the season, including grapes, peaches, apples, pears, melons, &c.—Up to Wednesday evening the Indian Famine Fund at the Mansion House amounted to 192,500*l*., of which 155,000*l*. has been remitted to India. Meetings are being held throughout the country with a view to sending relief to the distressed districts. Last night (Friday) the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs were to have attended in state the concert which Madame Liebhart gave in aid of the fund. Speaking at Kinross, Mr. Adam, M.P., expressed regret that Parliament was not now sitting, so that the question whether a national grant should be made to meet the requirements of the East might be discussed. Professor Fawcett at Salisbury on Wednesday also urged the necessity of Government action, recommending that a Committee should be appointed to investigate the whole question.—At Aberdeen on Wednesday the twenty-first annual meeting of the Social Science Congress was opened under the Presidency of Lord Aberdeen. In the opening address his lordship dealt with the subject of prison discipline, workhouse management, and the best modes of housing the poor.—Earl Fortescue and his eldest son, Lord Ebrington, met with a serious accident while returning from stag-hunting on Exmoor on Tuesday. The horses of their carriage became restive, and sprang over an unfenced bank near Simon's Bath, the carriage passing over Lord Fortescue's shoulder, and breaking his collar-bone.

SPORTING

The Turf.——Like all important meetings, Doncaster has afforded plenty of topics for Turf conversation for many days after its conclusion, and it is admitted on all hands that a more successful meeting was never held on the Town Moor. It is agreed, too, that, notwithstanding a somewhat serious scrimmage among some of the runners, the best horse won, and the result would probably be the same if the race were run over again for six successive days. By the style in which he won it is evident that Silvio is a better class colt than even his Derby victory would make him out. An unexpected feature of the race was the prominent position held both during the contest and at its finish by Lord Bradford's two animals, Zucchero and Manœuvre. The former, notwithstanding his not very brilliant antecedents, was backed for a large sum of money by his stable, and, unless some grievous mistake was made in the trial, is the better of the pair. Unless he had been seriously interfered with in the scrimmage alluded to, there can be little doubt but that he would not have been far behind Silvio; but, as it was, his jockey did not persevere with him. The fact of his stable companion, Manœuvre, being only beaten by a head from Lady Golightly, confirms this view. This exhibition of Lord Bradford's horses has very naturally called attention to their chances in the two great Autumn Handicaps, and already Zucchero is as good a favourite as anything for the Cesarewitch and Manœuvre for the Cambridgeshire. Considering that they are both lightly weighted, there are many things more improbable than that Lord Bradford might secure both races, unless Piccalilli, the winner of the Alexandra Plate at Doncaster on the Thursday, and also owned by his lordship, is better than Zucchero at the weights. At all events Wadlow's stable seems to hold the key to both contests. The Portland Plate, also run on the Thursday, showed that Rosbach, after all, is among the best of our three year olds. As we ventured to suggest in our Notes last week would be the case, the Champagne running soon proved incorrect, as in the 10 sovs. Sweepstakes Childeric reversed his running with the Champagne winner Clémentine. On the concluding day Hampton, with odds on him, took the Cup from Chesterton, Thorn, and Sugar Loaf, and thus gave additional proof that he is the best cup horse in the kingdom. Lady Golightly scored twice, first in the Park Hill Stakes, in which the Duke of Westminster's Helena held her for a considerable time, and afterwards in the Doncaster Stakes, in which she beat Albert Edward and three others in a canter by three lengths. By this time her owner, Lord

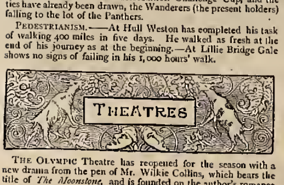
Falmouth, who has the credit of never betting, must have won something like 20,000*l.* in stakes with his comparatively small stud of running horses.—It is often the case that after an important race week that which follows it produces but little interest though plenty of racing. Such has been the case during this, and little or nothing worth noting has taken place at Chelmsford, Lichfield, Kingsbury, or Alexandra Park. The Ayr Meeting, the first of the series of Scotch gatherings which are assuming greater importance each year, was the best as far as regards the class of horses engaged.—Owing to complicated disputes the Sandown Park estate and race course has been submitted to the hammer, and bought by Colonel Owen Williams, a result which it is anticipated will bring about a settlement of all difficulties.—The French Omnium, which corresponds with our Cesarewitch, was run at Paris on the 15th inst, and resulted in the victory of Count de Juigne's Manchette, who started second favourite at Astree.

CRICKET.——The United South of England Eleven did not give the Eighteen of Hastings and District much chance, scoring 291 in one innings against 88 and 102. Jupp for the Eleven made another of his long scores, marking 89; while Mr. W. G. Grace had 71 credited to him.—The Yorkshire County Eleven, which seems to be going from bad to worse, made but a poor show against Eighteen of Leeds and District, and in their second innings could only make a total of 34.—The Nine Gentlemen of Sussex with Two Players were a little too much for Eleven Colts, but the latter showed form enough to give hope that there is some good cricketing stuff available for the county.—It is announced that a movement is actually on foot for organising an Australian cricket team to visit us next season. Our visitors would receive a warm welcome, and judging from what took place during the recent visit of English cricketers to Australia, we shall have to look to our stumps if we wish to retain our cricketing credit.

BICYCLING.——This popular pastime will have received a fresh impetus, if one were needed, by the conspicuous part, though not as an actual rider, taken by the Right Hon. Robert Lowe at the second annual meeting of the West Kent Club at the Crystal Palace. The racing was good, and good were the remarks made by the ex-Cabinet Minister to his hearers, especially those relating to the consideration which bicyclists should always show to drivers and riders of horses, and pedestrians too.

FOOTBALL.—We shall soon have the footballists at work. The season is certain to be a very busy one. No less than forty-three clubs have entered for the Association Challenge Cup, and the ties have already been drawn, the Wanderers (the present holders) falling to the lot of the Panthers.

PEDESTRIANISM.——At Hull Weston has completed his task of walking 400 miles in five days. He walked as fresh at the end of his journey as at the beginning.—At Lillie Bridge Gale shows no signs of failing in his 1,000 hours' walk.



THE OLYMPIC Theatre has reopened for the season with a new drama from the pen of Mr. Wilkie Collins, which bears the title of The Moonstone, and is founded on the author's romance of the same name. In converting that weird and exciting tale into a play, Mr. Collins has thought proper to take away from it nearly all its romantic character. He has suppressed the prologue in which the "looting" of the Temple at Seringapatam, and the abstraction of the mystic jewel, is so vividly portrayed; and he has entirely parted company with the Indians, who in the later period, to which the action of the tale properly belongs, play so important a part in maintaining the mysterious reputation of the stolen gem. It is true that something is said on the stage which conveys to attentive ears the fact that the moonstone is a sort of damnosa hereditas, and an object of superstitious awe; but the gentleman who is entrusted with the task of imparting this important information is the low comedian of the establishment, and hence, even if anybody has paid due attention to the statement, it is probably under the impression that it is only this gentleman's fun, of which quality indeed Mr. Hill's performance of the part of Betteridge the butler exhibits no lack. In fact, the precious jewel, which has such a wonderful history in the romance, is in the play a precious jewel, and nothing more. Readers of the novel will understand from this that the play is pitched in a wholly different key; but the reasons which have influenced Mr. Collins in thus dealing with his work are not easily to be discovered, unless they are founded on that passion for the ancient "unities" of time and place, which, as he points out in the playbill, have on this occasion been rigorously observed. There is reason to believe that a fair melodrama might be constructed on the basis of the romance. The prologue would afford matter for stirring and impressive scenes; the fantastic Indian legend might thus be insinuated into the minds of the audience, and the mysterious Indian emissaries, if sparingly introduced, and kept clear of ludicrous or otherwise incongruous associations, might hover about the later scenes and aid in sustaining the legendary spirit of the story, even to the death of the hypocritical rascal Ablewhite, and the final disappearance of the object of their search. To figure in this instance as a melodramatist is however not Mr. Collins's desire. He has aspired to write "a dramatic story" under the self-imposed and wholly unnecessary conditions of the classical drama. Four-and-twenty hours is the utmost he will allow himself for the supposed period of action, though even the severest adherents of the Greek dramatic lawgiver have taken a little more; and in a like spirit he has determined to uphold the whole story without a single change of scene. The curious circumstance is that he does not seem to have felt that in all this he was simply sacrificing his story without any counterbalancing advantage. The opening of the tale is concerned with the abstraction of the gem from the cabinet of the heiress, Miss Verinder, and the subsequent incidents are in great part confined to the search for the thief by slow and laborious processes. This is the thread in fact which the audience are invited to follow. But a theme like this has clearly little dramatic value in itself. Apart from the fact that the spectators are necessarily let into the secret that it has been taken by the hero, Franklin Blake, in a fit of somnambulism, and handed by him while in this unconscious state to Ablewhite, it must be obvious that to give importance and interest to a mere investigation of this sort would be uphill work; and so Mr. Collins has found it. The plot thus modified necessarily awakens no expectation, causes no suspense. As Blake is not aware of his own felonious act, it is, of course, felt to be hard that the heroine whom he loves should call him "villain, coward, liar," and so forth; but everybody has anticipated that his character will suffer no permanent stain. To be sure, the lady has actually witnessed the act, though she does not know that her lover was in the somnambulistic state; and she has—presumptively by rummaging in his bedroom—discovered his dressing gown, with the smear of varnish of which so much is made as a piece of evidence. Still, her conduct does not commend itself to the common-sense of the audience. She has the testimony of her own eyes for the fact that she has been robbed of property worth many thousands of pounds, and all sentiment between her lover and herself is now at an end. Why does she not therefore at once demand restitution? Why does she submit to be annoyed in her own house by a ridiculously incompetent detective, whom she has not sent for, and whose services she does not require? These and many other like questions inevitably suggest themselves while witnessing the performance, though the novelist's art is able to draw attention from them. The result is a certain vulgarity of tone which offends more than all. It wanted little beyond a final speech from the lady, apologising for having been so sure that her lover was a thief, to complete the prosaic situation of affairs. Mr. Neville, as the hero, deserves credit under these difficult circumstance for preserving an unconstrained and earnest manner; though this unfortunately served to bring into stronger relief the exaggerated vehemence of Miss Pateman's abusive attacks upon her guest and admirer.

The FOLLY Theatre has reopened for the performance of comic operettas and opera bouffe under the management of Mr. Henderson, who, though deprived for the present of the services of Miss Thompson, Mr. Brough, and Mr. Edouin, has assembled a very satisfactory company for the performance of pieces of this class. Conspicuous among these are Miss Corri, Miss Munroe, Miss Cameron, Miss Bromley, and Mr. Dudley Thomas, all well known to our stage; and with them is a gentleman named Howson, an amusing and original burlesque actor who has not, we believe, appeared in London before. The most important piece in the programme is The Creole, a version, by Messrs. Reece and Farnie, of Offenbach's La Créole, brought out in Paris two years ago. The Creole is bright and amusing in situations and dialogue, and is provided with abundance of music of a melodious and characteristic kind. In the way of brilliancy of scenery and costumes, and generally of picturesque arrangements of the stage, the performances at the Folly could hardly be excelled. We have only to add that the theatre has undergone a complete redecoration of a singularly tasteful kind.

Mr. Rowe having retired with his comedy entitled Brass from the stage of the HAYMARKET, Mr. J. S. Clarke has once more established himself at this theatre. The Widow Hunt and Paul Pry, in both which pieces Mr. Clarke appears, are not exactly dramatic novelties; but Mr. Clarke, as all playgoers are aware, has what is known as a repértoire the attractions of which appear to be inexhaustible. Mr. Clarke is very well supported, the rendering of Phœbe in Paul Pry by Miss Kate Phillips being especially fresh and spirited.

DRURY LANE Theatre will reopen this evening with a new romantic play entitled England in the Days of Charles II., written by Mr. W. G. Wills, and founded on Sir Walter Scott's "Peveril of the Peak."

Straus's opera bouffe, King Indigo, will be produced, for the first time in England, at the ALHAMBRA on Monday. The new libretto is by Mr. F. C. Burnand, and Mme. Selina Dolaro will appear as Fantasca.

MADAME ST. CLAIRE, the proprietress and manager of the ROYAL PARK Theatre, announces that all cabmen, upon production of their badges, will be admitted free during the run of Arrah-na-Pogue. We don't exactly see why cabmen should be especially interested in this piece, though we suppose Shaun-the-Post may be regarded as a member of the profession, but the example will possibly be followed by other managers. Colliers should be allowed to see Liz gratis on production of their safety lamps; and perhaps lodging-house "slaveys," on presentation of a face smeared with black lead, may be permitted to witness Miss Cicely Richards' impersonation in Our Boys.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT.——On the 1st of October next St. George's Hall will be reopened by Mr. and Mrs. German Reed. The season will commence with the last novelty, A Happy Bungalow. Mr. Corney Grain introduces a new Musical Sketch, and A Night Surprise concludes the programme. Novelties are in active preparation by F. C. Burnand and Gilbert A'Beckett.

THE MOORE AND BURGESS MINSTRELS.——On Tuesday evening these celebrated minstrels inaugurated their thirteenth anniversary. An attractive programme was provided and several new ballads introduced, notable amongst which were "Welcome, sweet herald of spring," admirably rendered by Mr. W. S. Leslie; "The fire in the grate," well sung by Mr. Charles Ernest; "See that my grave's kept green." pathetically sung by Mr. Vernon Reed; and a comic song, "Oh, George, tell me if you love me!" given by Mr. Moore in his usual inimitable style. Mr. Moore also sang "The Mulligan Guards," which, interpolated as it was with hits at a few of the topics of the day, fairly brought down the house. That the Moore and Burgess Minstrels have lost none of their well-deserved popularity was amply proved by the crowded state of the hall.

MR. HOLMAN HUNT'S well-known picture, "The Light of the World," is to be placed in the library of Keble College, Oxford.

A WHALE, twenty-six feet long, was caught off the Welsh coast, at Penmon, near Beaumaris, last week. It was exhibited at the Agricultural Show at Bangor.

A PROOF OF THE IMPROVED RELATIONS BETWEEN FRANCE AND GERMANY is given by the publication of a French journal in Berlin—The Olive Leaf—with the motto, "War against War—Right surpasses Strength."

THE CONFERENCE OF LIBRARIANS opens at the London Institution on the 2nd prox., when an exhibition of every kind of literary appliances will be held. Over eighty libraries have joined the movement, and the conference will suggest the formation of a "Library Association of the United Kingdom."

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE was to start for England either on Thursday or yesterday (Friday), weather permitting, the vessel being christened on Wednesday. The rudder, mast, deck-house, and "bilge pieces," to procure stability, have been fitted to the ship, which is to be towed by the steamer Olga.

THE CASTELLANI COLLECTION of gems, bronzes, marbles, &c., which has been exhibited in New York for some time past, and was to have been bought by the Americans, may, after all, come back to the Old World, as only a very small portion of the purchase-money—60,000*l.*—has been obtained. Our British Museum may yet have a chance of securing these treasures.

FRENCH ELECTORAL PROPAGANDA are carried on in most ingenious ways by the Republicans, and the latest device is to imprint the portraits of the Liberal leaders on those children's balloons given away by many of the principal Paris shops to their customers' little ones. Fourteen thousand balloons bearing the likeness of M. Thiers have been made since his death, and some are inscribed with the motto "Vive la France," or "Vive la République." It is proposed to manufacture balloons with the portraits of the 363, while at Lyons the factories are producing foulard handkerchiefs bearing the manifesto of the Republican deputies encircled by a tricoloured border, at the rate of 9,000 to 10,000 per diem.

ANOTHER ALPINE ACCIDENT is reported, this time in the Val Formazza, in Piedmont. The Syndic of Fruttwald, Herr Anderlini, with his sister and fiancée, were returning from a visit to the Falls of Tosa, on the St. Gothard road, when a mass of overhanging rock fell and killed Herr Anderlini and his sister on the spot, the other lady escaping with slight injuries. The Falls of the Tosa are remarkable for their vast body of water, combined with great height, as they are second only to the Schaffhausen Falls in volume. Referring to the disaster on the Lyskamm, the Continent and Swiss Times tells us that Mr. Lewis's watch had stopped at five P.M., and that there appears no reason to suppose that the accident was caused by the breaking of the rope, as the body of one of the guides had been fairly cut in two by the pressure of the cord connecting the five travellers.

WIESBADEN.——"W. P. K." writes as follows:—"Allow me to assure you that no cloud hangs over Wiesbaden—at least, none that the inhabitants are aware of. Your correspondent has apparently taken a passing visitor's view of the state of things—perhaps somewhat clouded by the pangs of gout or rheumatism. All over the Continent, as every one knows, the so-called travelling season has been bad, and money scarce; few English and Americans; no Russians. In this lack of custom, of course, Wiesbaden has shared. Still, the number of our visitors this year is officially stated as 54,119. In fact, however, we are but little affected by the larger or smaller number of summer visitors. Since the war and the closing of the gambling tables Wiesbaden has become a favourite permanent residence. Every year sees families arrive, who buy or build, and settle down here. It is a pleasant little town, healthy, and well built, a good winter residence, especially well sheltered from cold winds and storms, a beautiful neighbourhood, and charming walks and drives all about. Handsome broad streets have sprung up the last four years, fine villas have been built, and a plentiful supply of good water from the hills all through the town and environs. The schools are good, but rather crowded; excellent private masters in all branches are to be had. A good opera and famous orchestra, the Kurhaus, with two daily concerts, and balls twice a week for the strangers; reading-rooms, with no end of papers. If one cannot pass the time pleasantly, he must be hard to please. Besides this, the choice of mixing, if one so wishes, in good society, either English or German; and last, but not least, our nice little English church, well attended all the year through. Perhaps the one weak point is the expense of living. The great influx of residents, and consequent demand for houses, has nearly doubled the price for land and rent in the last five years, so that house-rent has become rather a serious item. Of late, perhaps, there is a little abatement; several villas built on speculation remain unsold, so that we may have less to complain of in that respect; but I have heard several of my English friends declare that a winter here costs them as much as in London or Brighton. Will you allow these few lines of vindication to appear, and assure our friends that pretty Wiesbaden is as bright and cheerful as ever? Although the emotions of the gambling table and the frou frou of the demi-monde may have passed away, they have been replaced by safer and more enduring enjoyments."

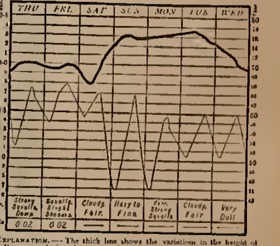
SEPTEMBER 13TH TO SEPTEMBER 19TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather over England remained in a very unsettled squally condition until Friday, the 14th instant, after which date a very great improvement took place. The depressions which had prevailed travelled away to the Baltic, the barometer rose very fast, and an area of high pressure advanced over our islands from the westward. As its centre remained over Ireland the winds experienced in Great Britain have been chiefly northerly, occasionally varying to north west in Scotland, and to north east in the southern parts of England. During Monday morning, the 17th instant, the wind freshened considerably in the south-eastern regions, and became squally for several hours, and on Wednesday morning, the 19th instant, a strong north westerly breeze was felt in Scotland, as well as on the eastern shores of the North Sea. At this time also the weather began to assume a less settled appearance, especially in the north and east. The barometer was highest (30·35 inches) on Tuesday, the 18th instant; lowest (29·80 inches) on Saturday, the 15th instant; range, (0·55 inches). Temperature, in the shade, was highest (66°) on Friday, the 14th instant; lowest (44°), on Sunday and Monday, the 16th and 17th; range, 22°. Rainfall. Total fall, 0·04 inches, on two days, the fall being 0·02 inches on each day. On Thursday morning, the 20th instant, the barometer was still falling in London, the wind had backed to west (apparently temporarily), with dull weather and cold rain.

RUSSIANS

FOREIGN

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——Defeat has fallen heavily upon the Russians of late. Before Plevna their reverses have been so serious as to render probable the abandonment of the attack, while the loss of life has reached an appalling total; in the Shipka Pass they have been defeated, and at one time lost Fort St. Nicholas, the very key to their positions; and on the Jantra Mehemet Ali is gradually driving back the Czarevitch. At the present moment the fortunes of war are most decidedly in favour of the Turks.

To resume our chronicle of the war. The Russians began the assault on Plevna on Tuesday week, and after reiterated attempts three of the redoubts to the south, on the Sofia road, were taken by General Skobeleff, while later in the day the Roumanians carried the great Gravitza redoubt. These successes, however, were not as great as the Russians had at first hoped, as it had been confidently asserted that Plevna would be captured on the Czar's fête day. The attack on the Gravitra redoubt, also, was at first so fruitless that the Czar retired despondently from the field, and the outwork was evidently carried by a surprise. General Skobeleff only held the southern redoubts one day. His losses had been so severe that he sent to General Levitzky for reinforcements, and though he repeated his demand again and again, no support came except part of a regiment, shattered at the first battle of Plevna. It is not easy to see the reason for General Levitzky's persistent refusal to succour his colleague—save the unworthy motive of jealousy. Accordingly Osman Pasha, who found the enemy at too close quarters, two powder magazines in Plevna having been fired by the Russian shells, on Wednesday week made a furious onslaught on the redoubts, and, although Skobeleff repulsed the assault five times, on the sixth attack he was forced to give way with the loss of more than half of his men and of three cannon. The Gravitza redoubt remained in possession of the Roumanians, and was fruitlessly attacked by the Turks on the succeeding day, while Friday was quiet, and was occupied by the Grand Duke Nicholas in choosing sites for new batteries. On Monday the Turks again attempted to capture the Gravitza redoubt, but were repulsed, and next day the Roumanians attacked a Turkish redoubt, but were equally unsuccessful. Since that time the bombardment has continued, varied only by a few reconnaissances, while the Grand Duke declares Osman Pasha to be short of ammunition. The Russian loss is officially acknowledged to be nearly 16,000 men, of whom 3,000 were Roumanians. The Russians fought magnificently, General Skobeleff proving himself the ablest and bravest general in the army, and decorations have been plentifully bestowed by the Czar.

Unsuccessful round Plevna at every point save Gravitza the Russians have at present little prospect of capturing the place except by the slow process of starving out the besieged, while the troops are likely to be sorely needed in another part of the field—probably to assist the Czarevitch on the Jantra, and the Grand Duke Nicholas has moved his headquarters back to Gorny Studen. Mehemet Ali continues his cautious advance, and besides sundry minor skirmishes has been successful in an attack on Sinan, which was occupied on Thursday week by Assaf Pasha, the Russians failing to retake the place on Friday. On Sunday the Turks occupied Osikova and Cerkova. The Czarevitch is carefully concentrating his troops round Biela, resolved on defending Sistova at all hazards until the arrival of the long-looked-for Imperial Guard, which is now not expected complete on the field before the 1st prox., although the first detachment passed through Bucharest on Tuesday, and the Czar has gone to meet them at Gorny Studen. The Russian front thus covers the line from Metchka, behind Pyrgos on the Danube, to Biela, and Mehemet can only march to Osman Pasha's relief after having defeated this force. Mehemet commands about 100,000 men, and has 168 guns. He may yet, however, be greatly assisted by Suleiman Pasha, who after several days' hard cannonading and continual harassing of the enemy by reconnaissances carried Fort St. Nicholas, in the Shipka Pass, by assault early on Monday morning. Suleiman could not maintain his success, however, and resigned the position in six hours for "strategical reasons." General Radetzky appears determined to hold out to the very last man before opening the way to Tirnova. Every preparation is now being made for a winter campaign, and General Todleben is on his way to the front to superintend the fortification of four bridge-heads leading into Bulgaria by Nicopolis and Simnitza, and into the Dobrudscha by Matchin and Hirsova.

Snow has fallen in ASIA, where the Russians have evacuated Ardahan, and have retired to the fortress of Emir Oglou, as they were weakened by the despatch of reinforcements to General Tergukassoff, near Igdyr, Ismail Pasha having advanced on Erivan. On Thursday week General Loris Melikoff advanced from Utshtepe, and attacked the right wing of Mukhtar Pasha's force, but was repulsed.—Prince Nikita has followed up his success in MONTENEGRO by taking the fortress of Bilek, an important conquest, as Bilek commands the road from Ragusa and Trebinje to Southern Herzegovina, and the Turks are compelled to bring all their supplies by way of Klek. As to SERVIA, she is thoroughly alarmed at the Turkish successes, and is unwilling to commit herself to definite action. Thus the troops which had been sent to the frontier have been recalled under pretence of having completed their annual manœuvres at Topschider. As the Servian people are by no means anxious for war, Prince Milan will probably think twice before he throws in his fortune with the Russians under their present reverses. ROUMANIA is highly delighted with the conduct of her troops, who have behaved with great bravery, and public prayers for the dead have been offered in the Roumanian churches. A number of wounded and six Turkish cannon arrived in Bucharest on Monday, and some of the former were received into the Palace, while the flag captured at the Gravitza redoubt was carried in triumph to the Cathedral.

The meeting of Prince Bismarck and Count Andrassy at Salzburg on Wednesday has given rise to further rumours of mediation, although it is asserted that AUSTRIA is firmly decided not to intervene unless asked by Russia. Their greeting is reported to have been most cordial, but nothing has yet transpired as to the result of the interview. The Emperor of Austria's toast at Kaschau, which produced so much speculation, proves to have been erroneously reported, and the word "ally" is declared not to have been uttered at all. This denial has much appeased the Hungarians, although at the opening of the Diet the policy of the Government in Eastern affairs was formally questioned, while several of the members have joined in the public festivities held at Pesth to celebrate the Turkish victories.

GREECE has been "protesting" vigorously, has remonstrated with the Porte anent the fresh fortifications at Arta and the despatch of troops, while a Note asserting her rights of independence in regard to armaments has been sent to the British Government.—There is little from CONSTANTINOPLE, where the fortification works have been suspended, and a hospital for Turkish women has been established by Mrs. Layard. The Porte has protested against the capture and destruction of Turkish merchant vessels by the Russian navy. The executions of Bulgarians at Adrianople have increased rather than diminished under the "clement" rule of Ahmet Vefyk.

FRANCE.——The elections have been officially fixed for the 14th prox., and a manifesto from Marshal MacMahon was published at the same time as the decree convening the electors. The Marshal, after declaring that he does not assume to exercise any influence on the choice of candidates, recapitulates his successful efforts to preserve order, and alleges that the late Chamber slighted his rightful authority, and sought to establish the despotism of a new Convention. He then bids the electors not to believe the assertion that the President wishes to overturn the Republic, as he intends to make the Constitution placed in his care respected, and recommends them to elect a Chamber which shall rise above party differences, and regard only the grandeur and prosperity of France. So far all is satisfactory; but the Marshal goes on to assert that elections favourable to his policy will facilitate the regular conduct of the Government—hostile elections, on the other hand, would aggravate the conflict between the public powers and would complicate his position, as he will not obey the injunctions of demagogues, and will remain to defend with the Senate the great interests which have been entrusted to him—i.e., if the nation does not side with him he will govern in spite of it, a declaration in direct contradiction to the moderate first part of his address. He concludes with an assurance that his rule will secure peace. By this manifesto the Marshal has entirely abandoned an irresponsible attitude, and, although declaring himself neutral, has completely identified himself with one party. People do not, however, exactly believe in the Marshal's threats, and the appeal has not produced a very strong impression. Of course, it is heartily condemned by the Republicans, while the Conservatives hail the proclamation as "a proud and noble address." To-morrow France enters on the electoral period when, until five days before the elections, public meetings may be held—"provided order is not disturbed and the law violated"—addresses issued, and speeches made in freedom. The Republicans will need all their self-control to avoid out-stepping the bounds, as one single violent utterance would give the Government a handle, and materially damage their cause.

The Marshal's electoral tour in the south has not done much good to the Government. He returned to Paris on Sunday night, having visited Riberac, Angoulême, Poitiers, and Tours, where he met with polite but not over-cordial receptions, "Vive la République" being the incessant cry of welcome. The speeches were insignificant till the Marshal reached Tours, when he reverted to his aggressive Bourges attitude, and, in reply to the decidedly Republican remarks of the officials, roundly told them that "elections favourable to my policy will soon restore calm and prosperity to the country," and further, that "I am the guardian of the Constitution which rules us. That Constitution cannot be endangered except by the adversaries of my policy." These declarations have caused great disappointment, as it was hoped from his Bordeaux speech that the Marshal was disposed to abandon his pet project of personal Government. The Duc Decazes has made an energetic declaration at Libourne in favour of preserving a peaceful policy, asserting that the country needs a long period of repose, and that the maintenance of order and concord was the earnest desire of the President and his Cabinet. These peaceable intentions are, however, equally professed by the Republicans, who, in reply to the Government journals' inquiry for their programme, declare that all France knows it as promising order, peace, liberty, stability for commerce, and prudent progress; in a word, the reversal of the programme of May 16.

M. Gambetta is doing his best to delay his trial, and by careful procedure may succeed in protracting it till after the elections, when he will of course be inviolate. He gave notice on Monday of appeal from the judgment of default, and the trial was fixed for to-day (Saturday), when a further appeal will be made for a trial by jury. The Bien Public and the Gaulois have been tried for reporting the trial, and have been convicted by default and condemned to the respective fines of 12*l.* and 8*l.* M. Grévy has not yet officially accepted the leadership of the Liberal party, although, in reply to the declaration placarded throughout France that he had hidden himself away in the Jura to avoid the post, and recommended people to agree with the Marshal, he formally declares the words and attitude ascribed to him to be a "calumny." M. Thiers' electoral manifesto will probably be published untouched. Meanwhile the Bonapartists are advocating temporary support of the Marshal, and considerable excitement has been created by the report that Prince Louis Napoleon is going to stay with a relation at Namur so as to be near the frontier during the elections.

Paris is rejoicing in a perfect shower of theatrical novelties. Not to mention several minor pieces the Lyrique has brought out a graceful three-act opera, La Clef d'Or, by MM. Feuillet and Gallet; a bright little operetta, L'Aumônier du Regiment, and a lyric drama on Lamartine's Graziella, which proved a failure; the Gymnase has produced Pierre Gendron, a clever sensational drama, by MM. Lafontaine and G. Richard, and Halévy's L'Eclair has been successfully revived at the Opéra Comique.—The new Avenue de l'Opéra, which runs straight from the Grand Opéra to the Place de Palais Royal, has been opened by Marshal MacMahon, and the first stone of a new English church has been laid at Neuilly.

ITALY.——The health of the Pope is causing serious anxiety, and the officials who inhabited remote apartments in the Vatican are being stationed nearer his rooms. He is still carried daily into the gardens, but the fatigues of this and the coming week will be a great strain upon his strength. He was to hold a Consistory yesterday (Friday) to fill up the offices of the Cardinal Camerlengo and Cardinal Penitentiary, and his major-domo and physicians have begged His Holiness to use a shortened ceremonial on the occasion, but he has firmly refused lest the alterations should invalidate the appointment of the Cardinal Camerlengo, under whose tenure of office the next Papal election will probably take place. This Consistory has been held before the original date—the 28th—as next week His Holiness is to receive deputations of condolence on the anniversary of the breach of the Porta Pia by the Italian troops. The foreign cardinals have been asked to forward their opinions on the measures to be taken with regard to the future Conclave.

UNITED STATES.——President Hayes' Southern tour has proved a great success, and he has been heartily welcomed at Louisville, where he addressed a large meeting on the necessity of union, reconciliation, and obedience to the Constitution. The President will next go to South Carolina.—The American Bankers' Convention at New York has pronounced in favour of early resumption of specie payments, declaring that the result will be best secured by the co-operation of the Government and the people through the Banks. The Massachusetts Democrats have also voted in favour of a gold currency, and, in nominating their Governor, declared that Mr. Tilden was legally elected, and that though submitting for peace's sake, they protest against the crime.—Indian raids are growing more serious. The Nez Percés recently attacked Gen. Sturgis on the Yellowstone River, and were defeated, and the Warmspring Indians have murdered fourteen persons in New Mexico. Other news items are the formation of a "North American St. George's Union," to assist needy Englishmen in the States, and to cultivate closer relations between the two Governments; the dedication of a monument at Flagstaff Hill, Boston Common, to the Bostonians killed in the Civil War; the success of the Americans in the International Rifle Match at Creedmoor, the Centennial trophy being presented to the victors on Tuesday; and the robbery of an express train on the Pacific Railway.

INDIA.——The famine prospects are decidedly more hopeful, as rain has fallen well in most Madras districts, and some of the people have left the Relief Works to sow cotton and food crops. The same improvement is reported from Bombay and Hyderabad, and a medium fall from elsewhere, but in Mysore the distress is severe. The unirrigated autumn crop is lost, but the winter crop is being sown. Lord Lytton has introduced a policy of making gratuitous relief subsidiary to working on relief works, and has increased the carrying powers of the railways. Engines and waggons have been borrowed for Madras, 200 new engines ordered from England, and the new Mysore and Bangalore Railway has been commenced. The Viceroy will take the Famine Portfolio on his return to Simla.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In BELGIUM there has been a great fire at Ghent, when the Military Hospital was burnt down.—GREECE has been mourning the death of the patriot, Admiral Canaris, who died of apoplexy at the age of 86. He received a State funeral, the King himself following.—The situation in EGYPT grows more critical, as the Nile is inclined to subside rather than rise.—There is a terrible drought in BRAZIL, and 200,000 persons are in distress.—In AUSTRALIA the fortifications of New South Wales have been decided according to Sir W. Jervois' plans, with the exception of the ironclad, and the Chinese Immigrants' Regulation Bill and the Goldfields' Act Amendment Act have passed the Queensland Legislature.

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice have concluded their visit to Loch Maree, and have returned to Balmoral. Although on their arrival at Loch Maree the weather was wet the last few days of their stay were very fine, and Her Majesty and the Princess made numerous excursions. They went to Gairloch, which was gaily decorated, and where the inhabitants gave them a hearty welcome; drove by the shores of the Loch through Glen Torridon and Loch Torridon; visited Kerrisbridge, where some of the inhabitants of the Isle of Lewes came over from Stornoway to greet the Royal party, and crossed Loch Maree to Isle Maree, one of the most interesting out of the twenty-four islands studding the Loch. On this island are the graves of a Norwegian Prince and Princess, a well whose waters were once warranted to cure insanity, and a tree into the bark of which every visitor is expected to place a coin. Loch Maree is eighteen miles long, and two miles wide at its greatest breadth, and is enclosed by mountains, the scenery being most picturesque. As the nearest church is 10 miles off, Her Majesty and the Princess attended service in the hotel on Sunday, and afterwards sailed on the Loch, while they spent the afternoon in the hotel grounds. On Tuesday the Queen and Princess Beatrice left Loch Maree and posted to Auchnasheen, where they took train for Ballater and drove to Balmoral. Her Majesty will return to the south about the middle of next month.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and their children are expected at Abergeldie about Wednesday next. The Prince came up to London at the end of last week, the Princess crossing with him to Portsmouth in the Osborne, and then returned to Cowes, where she has remained with her children. On Saturday night the Prince was at the Folly Theatre, and on Monday left town for Newburgh Park, to stay with Sir George Wombwell. On Tuesday the Prince went out partridge shooting, and on Wednesday he visited the Agricultural Show at Easingwold. Yesterday (Friday) he went to a garden party at Duncombe Park, and to-day was to leave Newburgh Park for the North.

The Duke of Connaught left London for Scotland at the end of last week, and arrived at Balmoral on Saturday afternoon. Next week he goes to stay with the Earl and Countes of Breadalbane at Taymouth Castle, where Prince Leopold is on a visit. Prince Leopold had a hearty reception on his arrival at Aberfeldy on his way to Taymouth, as he was welcomed by a deputation, the volunteers, Freemasons and schools turned out, three triumphal arches were erected, and the village was gay with bunting. A guard of honour received him at Taymouth Castle. On Monday he visited Sir Robert and Lady Menzies, and returned in the evening to the Castle, where he took part in some tableaux. The Prince was to go yesterday (Friday) to see Sir Coutts and Lady Lindsay at Balcarres House, and on the 28th inst. he will attend the Annual Meeting of the St. Andrew's Golf Club, of which he is Captain.—Prince and Princess Christian were expected at Nairn yesterday (Friday).

The Duke of Cambridge has been staying in Paris on his way home from Germany. He arrived on Saturday, and was to leave on Wednesday for England.

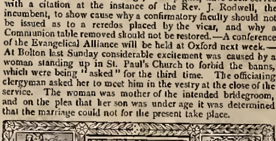
CHURCH NEWS

CONFESSION.——A memorial signed by many members of both Houses of Parliament directed against confession, and addressed to Her Majesty, is in course of preparation. The memorialists say that "they view with deep alarm the efforts now openly made by a considerable number of clergy to introduce into the Church of England the teaching and practice of Auricular Confession," and pray that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to use every legitimate influence to repress the practice. Bearing on this subject an interesting correspondence is published in the Guardian of Wednesday between the Bishop of Peterborough and Canon Lowe. The latter had requested permission to publish his lordship's name in support of some scheme of middle-class education in which he was interested. The Bishop at first refused to give any public recognition to the schools so long as any of its officials are members of the Society of the Holy Cross. The doctrines of the Society according to books which have its sanction, the Bishop asserts emphatically, "are definitely and unequivocally that of the Church of Rome as distinguished from that of our own Church." He describes the language and rules of the Society as entirely Roman, and calls upon all who are entrusted with the education of children publicly to withdraw from the Society. Canon Lowe, in assuring the Bishop that the member of Lancing College referred to had resigned his connection with the Society of the Holy Cross, states that it is only with the parent's consent that boys are to receive Confession.—The anniversary services of the Railway Guild of the Holy Cross were held last Sunday in some of the metropolitan churches. The Rev. J. W. Hewett, Provost of the Guild, preaching at St. Paul's, explained that it was no part of their object to bring about a restoration of Popery. The Society was composed of "honest Englishmen—English to the backbone—who desired to promote that great revival of Catholic spirit to which Keble, and afterwards Newman, Manning, and many others, were the first to give an impetus some fifty years ago."

THE JEWISH DAY OF ATONEMENT.——Monday was observed as a day of solemn fasting by the Jews. Shortly after sunrise the synagogues in every part of London were resorted to for the purpose of observing the sacred service of Yom Kippur. During the day many houses of business were closed throughout London.

OPEN-AIR PREACHING.——Mr. Spurgeon has been administering a few words of very necessary advice to the class of gentlemen who think it their duty to thrust their theological opinions upon their neighbours in the streets and highways. Presiding at the Evangelical Association meeting a few days ago, the rev. gentleman begged those who preached in the open-air to be above all things "natural." "Some preached in the prize-fighting style, as threatening with their fists, while they said, 'Come unto me.' Others used the pump-handle style." He had seen recently an enthusiast preaching at a street corner, having with him a Bible big enough to need a wheel-barrow to carry it, and he was preaching to a little dog—his sole auditor. In conclusion he warned them against oddity and eccentricity of style, lest the oddity should be remembered while the teaching was forgotten.

VARIOUS.——The reopening of the nave of Exeter Cathedral, which has undergone restoration, will take place next month. On October 18th and 19th services celebrating the completion of the work will be held, and sermons will be preached on the occasion by the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and the Bishop of Salisbury.—Cardinal Cullen has issued a letter to his clergy requiring them to have an offertory to-morrow (Sunday) for the Indian Famine Fund. The Bishop of Truro urges the clergy to ask the alms of their people for the same purpose. The Bishop of Winchester, in a circular enclosing a prayer for use in the churches, urges: "In this season of trial and danger let us commend to our people the duties of almsgiving and united prayer." "Move your congregations to contribute liberally to the sufferers by famine." The 5th of October has been set apart by the Wesleyans as a Fast Day. The President of the Conference suggests that collections "for the great necessity of our Indian Empire" shall be at once set afoot throughout the body.—An accident which might have been attended with disastrous consequences occurred last Saturday evening at St. Just, near Penzance. A congregation of Bible Christians numbering about 200 persons were assembled in the third story of a grocery store, part of the floor of which suddenly gave way during the singing of a hymn, precipitating about seventy or eighty persons to the floors below. The people fell among the groceries stored beneath, the confusion being considerably augmented by the ignition of a case of matches. No one was injured seriously.—The Archbishop of Canterbury is at present on a visit to his Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland and the Duchess of Marlborough.—The vicarage of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, which will be vacant at Christmas, has been offered by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol to the Rev. J. F. Fenn, vicar of Christchurch, Cheltenham.—The Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, will be closed on Sundays, the 23rd and 30th inst., and reopened for service on 7th October.—The churchwardens of St. Ethelburga, Bishopsgate, have been served with a citation at the instance of the Rev. J. Rodwell, the incumbent, to show cause why a confirmatory faculty should not be issued as to a reredos placed by the vicar, and why a Communion table removed should not be restored.—A conference of the Evangelical Alliance will be held at Oxford next week.—At Bolton last Sunday considerable excitement was caused by a woman standing up in St. Paul's Church to forbid the banns, which were being "asked" for the third time. The officiating clergyman asked her to meet him in the vestry at the close of the service. The woman was mother of the intended bridegroom, and on the plea that her son was under age it was determined that the marriage could not for the present take place.



MUSIC

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.——The strife between Leeds and Bradford, about a quarter of a century back, as to which should have the supremacy in a great musical festival, is still remembered by amateurs. Bradford, through more spirited and less divided action, carried the point, and gave two Festivals—in 1853 and 1856. Meanwhile, Leeds, smarting with jealousy, as being the superior town, had not only built a new and superb Town Hall, but was resolved to celebrate its opening by a series of grand performances, sacred and secular, to equal, if not surpass, the festivals which, at the then newly-erected St. George's Hall, had earned such distinction for its near neighbour. The difficult question was about the choice of a conductor; and after a considerable amount of discussion as to the respective merits of two local musicians, balanced by partially advocated claims in favour of Sir Michael (then Mr.) Costa, to whom Bradford had sworn allegiance, it was carried that the post should under any circumstances be filled by an English professor. The Englishman upon whom the choice fell was also a Yorkshireman, born at Sheffield, April 13th, 1816—the late Sir Sterndale (then Mr.) Bennett, one of the greatest musicians of his time—one, in short, whom Mendelssohn loved to honour. Sterndale Bennett composed his admirable cantata, The May Queen, for the occasion, and the Festival was a brilliant success. This, however, did not prevent Bradford from making a third great effort in 1859, which, artistically successful, but financially the opposite, was the last ever projected in that young and flourishing emporium of commerce. It was now hoped that, Leeds and Bradford co-operating, a triennial Yorkshire festival, recalling those old times when exclusive York itself was the musical centre of attraction, might be instituted. But no; perish the thought! The junior town would not submit to be admonished by its senior; nor would the latter, under any pretext, condescend to act as subordinate to its junior. The same differences of opinion with regard to conductors, and other essential matters, cropped up again, and neither party was in the humour to accommodate the other. Thus, from 1858 to sixteen years later on, Yorkshire, to all high intents and purposes, was harmoniously mute. Towards the end of this period, however, Leeds once more took the initiative. A grand festival was announced for the autumn of 1874, and Sir Sterndale Bennett having abandoned all idea of reappearing in public, local antagonistic claims were set aside in favour of Sir Michael Costa, who, being offered the post of conductor, willingly accepted it. The Festival of 1874, it may be remembered, was a genuine success; the funds of the medical charities in Leeds were enriched with a contribution of 1,000*l.*; and so content were the promoters that, by unanimous consent, it was determined to constitute the Festival as "triennial." Now, in 1877, we find the hopes engendered three years back substantially confirmed. The guarantors, between 300 and 400 in number, headed by the Mayor of Leeds and Viscount Pollington, High Sheriff of Yorkshire, have ensured a sum of no less than than 11,000*l.* to meet all contingencies. From the ranks of these magnanimous amateurs a "General Committee," and from the members of the "General Committee" an "Executive Committee" (which virtually does all the work) are selected. The President is Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord-Lieutenant of the West Riding, with whom are associated a goodly number of vice-presidents, from the clergy, nobility, and gentry of the county, who, considering their share in the active part of the proceedings, may be set down as a simple catalogue of names, looking attractive enough on paper, just as the name of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen looks attractive when set down as "Patron"—beyond which, nothing; ex nihilo, &c. The arrangements of the "Executive Committee" have met with what we cannot but look upon as well merited approval. A programme both varied and attractive has been drawn out, the details of which, having already been published in The Graphic, it is needless to recapitulate. One preliminary paragraph, heading the catalogue of "principal vocalists," gracefully refers to the absence of Mdlle. Titiens, and its inevitable cause. The foresight of the Committee, however, amid conflicting statements published every now and then, as from official sources, about the eminent Teutonic dramatic singer's state of health, when those better informed were aware that there was no chance of her appearing either at Gloucester or Leeds (much less at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Albert Hall), had provided for this by the engagement of Mdlle. Albani, to fill her place. As was proved at Gloucester, no one more competent than Mdlle. Albani for such a seemingly ungrateful task could have been selected; and the Leeds Committee did prudently in thus quickly following the example set down for them by the managers of the Three Choir Festival. That, with Sir Michael Costa as director, a first-rate orchestra would be secured might have been counted on in advance; and so among the instrumental players were recognised nearly all the distinguished artists belonging to Her Majesty's Theatre. With regard to the chorus, upwards of 300 strong, no praise can be fairly deemed exaggerated. The Yorkshire voices are unrivalled in Great Britain—the freshest and the strongest. This was admitted by every one who heard them in 1874, when, not only the familiar Messiah, but Professor Macfarren's St. John the Baptist, a work to them as unfamiliar as it was difficult, afforded a test of their quality which won unanimous acceptance. Judging from their performances at the rehearsals of Elijah, the Walpurgis Night, Bach's "Magnificat," the "Requiem" of Mozart, Beethoven's Mount of Olives, and, last not least, Professor Macfarren's new oratorio, Joseph, a new triumph was in store for them. The conclusion was fully justified by the result, in Elijah, the oratorio selected for Wednesday, the opening day. Without entering into minute details it may be said in a word, and with the strictest truth, that the magnificent choruses of Mendelssohn, so varied in style and yet all so suggestive, and, to employ a common expression, "characteristic," were never more magnificently given, and that the promise of 1874 was fully carried out by this glorious display. About the performances generally we must speak in our next. The Festival comes to an end this day, with a miscellaneous performance of sacred music.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

SO MUCH that is really good occurs in "Blanche of Bourbon; and Other Poems," by H. Alcmar (Thos. Hookham), that it seems fair to opine that the author may, with practice and labour, yet do something worthy of remembrance, crude as his attempts at present are. He is probably a young man, and a sincere admirer of Scott, which is no little credit both to his mind and his taste in the present day. It may be added that in managing the romantic metre he shows a true appreciation of its nature, and as a general rule avoids doggrel—the common pitfall for poetasters who try to copy "Marmion." His faults are chiefly such as might have been avoided by care and polish; it is a common mistake with young and ardent writers of verse to think, in spite of Horace's advice, that there is no call for labour over the perfecting of their productions. Both rhyme and rhythm are occasionally so slovenly, as to make one doubt Mr. Alcmar's having a correct musical ear; but then other passages, and long ones, are so good in this direction that the blemishes must be attributed to the cause already assigned. And metaphor, when used, should be used correctly—"heads" cannot be said to "lie wrecked on shoals," whatever may happen to figure-heads. The story is a good one, viz.: the imprisonment and murder of the queen of Pedro the Cruel, and is, on the whole, well told; about the best parts are the opening of Canto II., which shows a keen sense of the beauties of nature; the description of the king at page 32, and a passage in Canto I., beginning—

> Sleep on! Ah, happy if thy ills were past.

The minor verses do not call for notice.

The writer's name and reputation hardly prepared us for the disappointment which we have experienced in reading "Leszko the Bastard: a Tale of Polish Grief," by Alfred Austin (Chapman and Hall). No doubt the verse is musical, as Mr. Austin's verse could hardly fail to be; and there are fine passages here and there—for instance, the description of Vanda's flight from her Russian persecutor is admirable, and there is tremendous power in her son's tale of how he avenged her wrong;

> He fell to me! One thrust I made,
> And at my feet I saw him laid.
> I sucked the blood from off my blade!
>   Christ! it was sweet! ay, sweeter far
> Than the smile of home, than the kiss of maid,
>   Or the glow of the evening star!

But, without wishing to be prudish, we do think the mother and son are sometimes unnecessarily minute in detail; and it is hard to see what good end can be served by such a poem, for a poem it undoubtedly is, and that a fine one. The tale is avowedly fictitious; and therefore the most ardent advocate of Poland can hardly hope that the deductions from such premises should be accepted in evidence. And the perverted patriotism which could lead a christened man to join the Infidel against his fellow Christians, is only one more instance of how even virtues may become dangerous unless under proper guidance. We want the author of "The Human Tragedy" for something better than this sort of thing; his art is of too high an order to be wasted on either Turkophilist or Russophilist pamphlets.

Those who desire to understand the difference between imitation and originality, cannot do better than study, in connection with the last-named work, the writings of one of the sweetest, if not the loftiest, of Scotland's poets—now, unhappily, too much neglected. "The Poems of Allan Ramsay" (Paisley: Alex. Gardner) have just been reissued in a new two-volume edition reprinted from the collection of 1800, and no man's verses better deserved reproduction. The original notices of the poet are appended, and it is both curious and satisfactory to note the tone in which they were written. Imagine a time when it was thought needful to tell folk that Lowland Scotch—so called—was only good old English, and that there was nothing vulgar in its use; and when an educated man positively viewed with pleasure a mythical coming disuse of the mother tongue amongst the Scots peasants! We certainly have grown wiser, and rather less snobbish, since we began to escape from the influence of the last century! Of course some of the pieces would hardly do to read aloud at the present day—"Lucky Spence's last advice," for instance! But all true lovers of nature must always rejoice in "The Gentle Shepherd." And who can listen unmoved to "The Yellow-haired laddie," or "The Lass of Patie's Mill?"; whilst for genuine, caustic satire, if somewhat broad, the tales and fables should take a much higher rank than is generally assigned them. The volumes are very handsomely produced.

"Pet Moments," by R. A. Douglas-Lithgow (Provost) are some verses dedicated by permission to the Poet Laureate, but have little else to recommend them. The lines at page 89, headed "Heroism," are rather good. But may we suggest to the author, that under no licence of accent can "gone" rhyme with either "lawn" or "dawn," that Naiads do not habitually live in woods, and that, if it be needful to apologise for the imperfection of verses (page 157), they would have been better omitted.

LEGAL

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.——The September session was opened on Monday. The calendar contains the names of forty-three male and fourteen female prisoners. Seven prisoners are charged with wilful murder, one with manslaughter, two with bigamy, sixteen with burglary, &c. The trial of Mr. Swindlehurst and Dr. Baxter Langley, who are charged with larceny as officers of the Artisans Dwellings Association, and also for conspiracy, has been postponed until the October sitting. The trial of the brothers Staunton, E. A. Staunton, and Alice Rhodes, charged with the murder of the wife of Louis Staunton, began on Wednesday before Mr. Justice Hawkins, and threatens to absorb for some days public attention and the time of the Court. The Court is daily besieged by the usual excited multitude applying for admission. Mr. Justice Hawkins suggested the propriety of delaying the trial until yesterday (Friday), on account of the length of time likely to be consumed to the prejudice of other important cases; but on being assured that the cross-examinations and speeches would in all probability be completed by to-day (Saturday), the case was proceeded with. The prisoners on taking their places in the dock seemed calm and self-possessed. During Wednesday the Attorney-General opened the case for the prosecution, and Mrs. Butterfield, the mother of the deceased, gave her evidence.

MURDER IN ST. LUKE'S.——A brutal crime was committed last Friday morning at Wilderness Row, St. Luke's, the victim, Elizabeth Brockington, having been stabbed in the street by a bargeman, named Thomas Pratt. At the inquest it was stated by Caroline Maule, the chief witness, that as she passed the police-station in Old Street she heard the deceased woman say to a policeman, "I'd much rather you'd lock me up than I'd go with him." The policeman ordered the man to go one way while the woman went with the witness in the opposite direction. They were pursued by Pratt, who, without apparent provocation, stabbed the woman, and on being rebuked by the girl, turned on her also, saying, "I would as lief stick the knife into you as look at you." On the policeman coming up he gave himself into custody, and acknowledged his guilt. The woman died ten minutes after she arrived at the station. She had been stabbed to the heart. The jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Pratt, who was forthwith committed to the Central Criminal Court on the coroner's warrant.

MATRIMONIAL HOAX.——From Hamilton, N.B., there is reported this week a practical joke not unlikely to end in the police-courts. A Scotch Romeo on the shady side of forty advertised some time ago in a Dundee paper that he being "a working man of independent income wished to correspond with a young woman" with a view to matrimony. The advertisement was duly answered by a fair damsel, who arranged that the swain was to come to Hamilton last Friday evening to meet her. He came. At the station Juliet met him, and under pretext of "leading him to her aunt's house" led him into a trap, where some unsentimental Philistines awaited him. By them he was seized, thrown down, tied with a rope to a hedge, and besmeared from head to foot with treacle, and left lying on the road bewailing his fate until released by some passers-by. The police are on the outlook for the perpetrators of this rather cruel specimen of "Scotch wut."

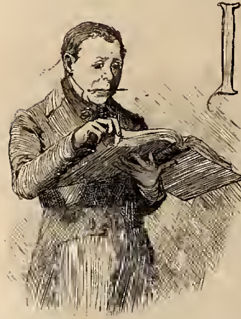
CHAPTER VII.

AUGUSTUS IN THE LEGAL



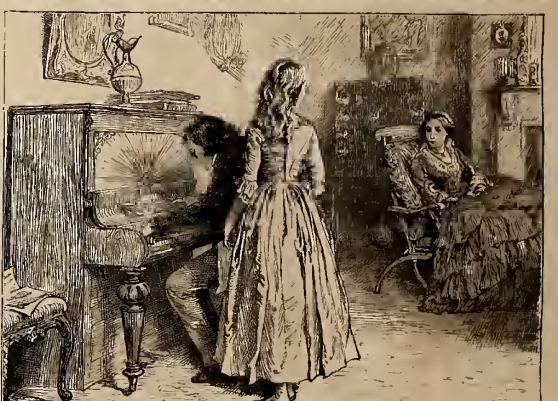
I HAD one short experience of the way in which other people work for money. It lasted three months, and happened when Mr. Tyrrell, out of pure kindness, proposed that I should enter his office. He said many handsome things about me, in making this offer, especially in reference to his daughter, and pledged himself to give me my articles if I took to the work.

I accepted, on the condition that I kept my afternoons free for Celia, and began the study of the law.

Well, suffice it to say that after three months the Captain became my ambassador to convey my resignation. And the only good thing I got out of my legal experience was the friendship of the Bramblers.

Augustus Brambler, the head of the family, was one of Mr. Tyrrell's clerks. Not the head clerk, who was a man of consideration, and had an office to himself, but one of half-a-dozen who sat in the room built for them at the side of the house, and drove the quill for very slender wage from nine in the morning to eight at night. Augustus was no longer young when I first met him, being then past forty years age. And although the other clerks were little more than boys, Augustus sat among them with cheerful countenance and contented heart. He was short of stature, and his face was innocent of whisker and as smooth as any woman's; his features were sketchy, his eyes were large and bright, but his expression, in office hours, was maintained at a high pressure of unrelenting zeal. Nature intended him to be stout, but with that curious disregard for her colleague which Fate often shows, his income prevented the carrying out of Nature's intention. So that he remained thin, and, perhaps, in consequence, preserved his physical activity, which was that of a schoolboy. I was placed under his charge, and received papers to copy, while the chief clerk gave me books to read. I did copy the papers, to my infinite disgust, and I tried to read the books, but here I failed.

Augustus Brambler, I soon discovered, did the least responsible work in the office, enjoying a certain consideration by reason of the enormous enthusiasm which he brought into the service. He magnified his humble office; saw in it something great and splendid; beheld in himself the spring of the whole machine; and identified himself with the success of the House. You would think, to listen to him, that he had achieved the highest ambition of his life in becoming a clerk to Mr. Tyrrell, that his weekly stipend of thirty shillings was a large and magnificent income, and that the Firm was maintained by his own personal exertions.



Sometimes, after playing one of my own studies, it would please us to see Mrs. Tyrrell waking up out of the doze in which she spent most of her afternoons.

Certainly these were not wanting. He was in the office first in the morning, and left it the last in the evening. He kept the other clerks to their work, not only by example but by precept, admonishing them by scraps of proverbial philosophy, such as—in the case of one who longed to finish and be gone—

> Hurry and haste are worsen than waste;

or of one who was prone to scamp the work in order to talk,

> Sure and slow is the way to go;

while in the case—too common among lawyer's clerks—of one who came too late to office, he had a verse as apt as if it had been a Shakespearian quotation, though I have never seen it in Shakespeare.

"What," he would say, "do we learn from the poet?"

> Get up betimes, and at the dawn of day,
> For health and strength to serve your master pray.
> Sharp at clock striking, at the point of eight,
> Present yourself before the office gate.

"It should have been nine," he would add, "but for the sake of the rhyme."

His eagerness to work was partly counterbalanced by his inability to do anything. He knew nothing whatever, after years of law work, of the most ordinary legal procedure; he could not even be trusted to copy a document correctly. And yet he was never idle, never wasting his employer's time. Mostly he seemed to be ruling lines laboriously in red ink, and I often wondered what became of the many reams beautified by Augustus with such painful assiduity. At other times he would take down old office books, ledgers and so forth, and, after dusting them tenderly, would turn over the leaves, brows bent, pencil in hand, as if he was engaged in a research of the most vital importance. At all events, he did not allow the juniors to waste their time, and, as I afterwards found out, was only continued in the service of Mr. Tyrrell because he earned his weekly stipend by keeping the youngsters at their work, carrying with him wherever he went an atmosphere of zeal.

He had not been always in the present profession.

"I have been," he would say, grandly, "in the Clerical, in the Scholastic, and in the Legal. Noble professions all three. I began in the Clerical—was a clerk at Grant and Gumption's, where we had—ah!—a Royal business, and turned over our cool Thousands. Thought nothing of Thousands in that wholesale House. Mr. Gumption, the junior partner—he was an affable and kind-spoken man—once took me aside, after I had been there two years or so, and spoke to me confidentially. 'Brambler,' he said, 'the fact is this work is not good enough for you. That's where it is; you're too good for the work we give you. I should say you ought to change it for something superior—say in the Commercial Academy line, where your abilities would have full scope—full scope.' I thought that advice was very kindly meant, and I took it, though it really was a blow to give up sharing in those Enormous profits. However, he seemed to know best what was to my advantage, and so I retired from Grant and Gumption's with the best of recommendations, and joined Mr. Hezekiah Ryler, B.A., in his Select Academy for Young Gentlemen. Perhaps the salary was not so good as might have been desired, but the work—there was the great advantage—the work was splendid. There you are, you know, that's what it is, in that line—there you are. Dozens of possible Shakespeares learning their Latin grammar under your direction; posterity safe to read about you. 'This great man,' the biographer will say, 'was educated at the Select Academy of Mr. Hezekiah Ryler, B.A., one of whose assistants was the zealous Augustus Brambler.' That thought was enough to reconcile me to much that was disagreeable, for there are things about the work of an ush—I mean the assistant of a Commercial Academy which some men might not like. I was with Mr. Ryler, B.A., for a year, I think, when he suggested—his manner was kindness itself—that perhaps I should find a more congenial sphere for my talents. I gave up the Scholastic, and tried some other line. He was so good as to suggest the Legal, and so I tried it. That was twenty years ago. Since then I've been going backwards and forwards between the Scholastic, the Legal, and the Clerical. It's a very remarkable thing, if you come to think of it, to be born with a genius fit for all three professions."

He firmly believed himself endowed by Nature with exceptional qualities, which fitted him equally for the positions of commercial clerk, legal clerk, or schoolmaster, and regarded the numerous dismissals which rewarded his labours as so many compliments to his energy and worth. In the sense I have already explained he was invaluable; his honesty and enthusiasm were contagious, and he never, I am sure, understood that, owing to some strange fogging of his enthusiastic brain, he could do nothing at all in the way in which it ought to have been done. When he was in the employment of a merchant his figures always came out wrong; when he was a teacher the boys never learned anything; and when he was a lawyer's clerk he could only be trusted to rule lines in red ink, copy letters in the press, serve a writ, and make a show, with a pile of paper, of doing important work. Yet, because the man was well known in the town for his breezy enthusiasm, for his integrity, and for the honesty which characterised all he did Augustus Brambler had never been long without a place. He was now, however, a fixture at Mr. Tyrrell's.

One evening, after I had been a month or so in the office, he invited me, in the finest manner, to take supper at his house. Had he bidden me to a lordly banquet the invitation could not have been conveyed more grandly. I accepted, and walked home with him, presently finding myself in a back parlour lighted by a single candle, multiplied by two on our arrival. The cloth was laid for supper, and half-a-dozen children, from ten or twelve downwards, crowded round the bread-winner, and noisily welcomed him home. They were all absurdly like their father, their eyes were as twinkling, their faces as full of eager enthusiasm; their figures as stout. And there was exactly the same regularity of diminution in their size that may be remarked in a set of Pandean pipes.

The mother, on the other hand, was thin and anxious-looking. It was easy to see that this poor wan-cheeked and careworn creature shared none of her husband's golden joy in the present. We sat down at once to the meal, Augustus Brambler saying grace in an impressive manner. It was a rich, and even an unctuous grace, such a grace as might be pronounced before a City dinner, thanking the Lord for the many and various good things He had provided for His creatures. And then, the heart of all attuned to the solemnity of the occasion, he seized the knife, and looked round him with the air of one who is about to commence an important work. "Bread, my children, bread and cheese, Your mother will carve the cheese. Mr. Pulaski—I should say, perhaps, Count Pulaski?—No. My dear, Mr. Pulaski takes supper with us incognito, like a foreign prince. It is not often that we receive a nobleman at our simple table. Pray assist Mr. Pulaski from the green corner, which is more tasty. Crust, Mr. Pulaski? Forty-seven, your elbows are on the table. Forty-six, calm your impatience. That boy, Mr. Pulaski, will carry through life the effects of the fatal year in which he was born."

While he talked, he went on distributing crust and crumb with the same vigour with which he was wont to rule the red ink lines.

I ventured to ask if the children had no Christian names.

"It is only their father's way," said the mother. "They have names like any other Christians, but I don't think they know them, themselves."

Augustus—the children being now all helped—sat back in his chair, and waved his hand with importance.

"My own theory," he explained; "formed even before I married, while I was in the Clerical. Matured while in the Scholastic, where I had access to works of philosophy, including the first book of Euclid, and to works of biography, including Cornelius Nepos. Published, if I may use the expression, while in the Legal. It is this, Mr. Pulaski. Childhood catches measles and whooping-cough, and shakes them off; but a child never shakes off the influences——Forty-eight, if you do not obey your sister you shall go to bed—of the year in which it was born. My eldest," he said, pointing to the tallest of his family, a girl, "was born in '44. She is therefore predisposed to poetry."

I did not ask why, but the girl, a pretty child of twelve, blushed and looked pleased.

"Her brother, Forty-five," Augustus continued, "is restless and discontented. That is easily explained if you think of the events of that year. A tendency, my boy, which you will have to combat during life. Like asthma."

"When we come to Forty-six," he went on, "what can we expect? The Famine Year. The appetite of that boy would strain the finances of a Rothschild."

Forty-six, who was a healthy, rosy-cheeked boy, with no outward marks of the great Famine upon his fat little figure, was working his way diligently through a great crust of bread and cheese. He looked up, laughed, and went on eating.

"Forty-seven,"—pointing to a little girl,—"the year of calm. The calm before the storm. The next boy is Forty-eight. Ah! the year of rebellion. He is a boy who questions authority. If that boy does not take care to struggle with his tendency, I should not be surprised, when he grows up, to find him throwing doubt upon the Thirty-Nine Articles——"

"Oh! Augustus," cried his wife.

"I should not, indeed, my dear. Forty-nine is gone to bed. So is Fifty. So is Fifty-two."

I was afraid to ask after Fifty-one, for fear there had been a loss, but I suppose the question showed in my face, because the family faces instantly clouded over.

"We never had a Fifty-one," said Augustus, sorrowfully.

His wife sighed, and the little girls put their handkerchiefs to their eyes. Forty-six took advantage of the general emotion to help himself to another piece of bread.

"No Fifty-one," Augustus sighed. "It was our unlucky fate. What a boy that Fifty-one would have been! All the wealth and genius of the world came to the front that year. I even wish, sometimes, that he had been twins."

We were all deeply touched, nor did it occur to me till afterwards that we were lamenting over a mere solution in the chain of annual continuity.

"But talking is dry work," resumed Augustus, taking up a brown jug, one of those jolly old jugs, with a hunt upon them in relief, that are only now to be seen in the National Club, and bestowing an Anacreontic smile upon his family. "What have we here, boys and girls, eh? What have we?"—as if there were an infinite choice of drinks in that house. He poured out a glass, holding it up to the light, turning it about, and critically catching the colour at the proper angle. "Clear as a bell—sparkling as champagne. Let us taste it.——Toast and water, my children,——aha! Toast and water—and—the—very—best—I ever tasted."

We had glasses round, and all smacked our lips over the nasty concoction, and he went on in his enthusiastic strain.

"It is a splendid business, the Legal. We are making, not to betray the confidence of the house, only we are here all friends, we are actually making more than two hundred pounds a month; think of that children, Two—Hundred—Pounds—a month. Fifty pounds a week—eight pounds, six shillings and eightpence every working day. Nearly fifteen shillings an hour—threepence a minute!"

All the children gave a great gasp. At the moment they firmly believed their father to be personally in receipt of this fine income. Poor little shabby boys and girls, with their darned and patched clothes, their bread and cheese banquets, and their toast and water. It was, indeed, a splendid income that their father enjoyed.

Supper ended, the children went off to bed. Then we put out the candles, not to waste light, and sat round the open window for half an hour, for it was a warm night, talking.

At least Augustus Brambler talked. And I began to see in what an atmosphere of imaginary ease the man lived and moved. His social position was, in his own eyes, an enviable one; his abilities were recognised; his future was one of steady advance; his children were well fed, well dressed, and well educated; his poor wife as happy as himself.

From time to time I heard a footstep over head.

"It is Herr Raumer. We allow him to occupy our first floor," Augustus explained grandly. He was not by any means anxious to hide the fact that he had a lodger who paid the whole of the rent, but it was his way of putting it.

I knew Herr Räumer by sight, because he came a good deal to Mr. Tyrrell's office. He was a German—a very big man, tall and stout, with a white moustache—a great mass of perfectly white hair, of the creamy whiteness which does not convey the impression of age or decay, and had a tread like a cat for lightness. He walked as upright as a soldier, wore blue spectacles out of doors, and had a curious voice, very deep, with a rasp in it. But as yet I had never spoken to him.

"He is our lodger," said Mrs. Brambler. "And he gives us a deal of trouble with his veal cutlets."

"Eats them with prunes," said Augustus.

"And complains of his tea. But he pays his bill every week, and what we should do without him I am sure I do not know. He is a very regular man. He has dinner at six, and smokes his pipe till half-past ten. Then he goes to bed. Where is Ferdinand, my dear?"

"At work in his room. But it is almost his time."

As he spoke the door opened, and Ferdinand Brambler came in. It was almost too dark to see him, but I knew his face, having seen it about the streets as long as I could remember. He was very much like his brother, being short, smooth-cheeked, and inclined to be stout, but he had not the same look of eager zeal. That was replaced by an expression of the most profound wisdom. And he had a habit of throwing his head backwards, and gazing into the sky, which I understood later on.

I rose to go, because it was past ten. As Augustus led me out of the room I heard Mrs. Brambler ask anxiously,

"What have you done to-day, Ferdinand?"

"A leg of mutton," he replied in a sepulchral voice. "And I think heeling and soling for one of the children's boots besides."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE UNFORTUNATE YOUNG NOBLEMAN

I continued my acquaintance with Augustus Brambler after I left Mr. Tyrrell's office. The atmosphere of that place very soon, as I have explained, became unbearable to me. The tips of my fingers began to feel as if they were made of parchment, which, as Cis confessed, would be bad for playing. In those days, too, clerks always stuck their pens behind their ears, a practice to which I could never reconcile myself. The association of that beautiful and delicate organisation the ear, the only avenue of the sixth sense, the appreciation of music, with quills and legal forms was revolting. Then what harmonies can be got out of the scraping of pens upon paper? The wind in the trees one can understand; and the waves by the shore; and the purling of a brook; but the scratching of steel, which you hardly perceive at first, but which makes itself heard with a strident noise which after a time becomes out of all proportion to the size of the instrument, who is to become reconciled to that? As an instrument of torture, I can conceive nothing worse than a room full of pens all at work together.

Old Wassielewski, who after nearly effacing himself during the schooldays was beginning to take a new interest in my proceedings, approved of my giving up the law. That a Pulaski should be a clerk in a lawyer's office was a blot upon the scutcheon; that he should become an actual practising lawyer was an abandonment of everything. When my destiny came to me in the shape of music-lessons, he was good enough to signify approval, on the ground that it would do for the short time I should want to work for money. I paid small attention to his parenthetical way of looking at life—all the Poles lived in this kind of parenthesis, waiting for the downfall of Russia, carrying on their little occupations, which lasted them till death allowed their souls to return to Poland, under the belief that it was only for a time. The Captain, however, deserved more respectful attention. He had small admiration for writing in any form; was accustomed to confound the highest works of genius with the commonest quill-driving; quoted an old acquaintance of the ward-room who once wrote a novel, and never held his head up afterwards; "Sad business, Laddy. Half-pay at forty."

As for giving music-lessons, the Captain was perplexed. To play on any instrument whatever seemed to him a waste of a man—at the same time there was no doubt in his own mind that I was only half a man. And when he clearly understood that I did not propose to lead a procession of drunken sailors like poor old Wassielewski, or to play the fiddle at a soldiers' free-and-easy, he gave in.

"Have your own way, Laddy. Jingle the keys and make other people jingle. There's sense in a song like 'The Death of Nelson' or 'Wapping Old Stairs'—and those you never care to play. But have your own way."

Gradually, the Captain came to see some of the advantages of the profession. "You give your lesson, take your money, and go. So much work and so much pay. No obligation on either side. And your time to yourself."

It was evident to me, as soon as I began to give lessons, that I was engaging myself for the rest of my life to become a music-master. I became a music-master because there was really nothing else for me at which I could earn my bread. Teaching of any other kind would have been intolerable, if only for the fact of my unlucky figure. Æsop, himself the most philosophical of hunchbacks, would have trembled at the thought of facing a class of boys—that age which La Fontaine says is without pity. But to sit for an hour beside a girl playing exercises while the mild-eyed governess played propriety was different. So I gave up everything except the piano and the organ, and started in practice as a teacher of the pianoforte. As Nature had given me a reasonably good pipe, I engaged myself at the same time to teach singing.

I was eighteen then, perhaps too young to take upon myself the responsibility of teaching. But pupils came to me, and in a few months I was happily beyond the want of any further help from the Captain. People invited me to give lessons from different motives; some because they thought that a Pole would take their girls at half the price of ordinary professors—in the same way, after the Commune of 1871, the friends of the exiles got them pupils on the ground that they would teach French for a shilling an hour; some came to me because I was young, and they wanted to boast that they were encouraging rising genius; a few, no doubt, because they really thought I could play well and teach their daughters. One lady who had a select boarding and day school—she dressed in black cotton velvet, and bound her brows with a black ribbon, as if to compress and control the gigantic intellect beneath—engaged my services, as I afterwards learned, in order that she might announce on her cards that music was taught at Cape St. Vincent House (established 1780) by the "young, unfortunate, and talented Polish nobleman, Count Ladislas Pulaski." But as there is no possible romance about a lad of five feet nothing, with long arms, crooked back, and round shoulders, parents who came from a distance, allured by the "unfortunate foreign nobleman," were not allowed to see me. I found out the thing after a time, and was foolish enough, being then quite young, to throw up the engagement in a rage quite befitting my illustrious descent. Afterwards I learned to behave with patience when I was received, as always happened, with a certain deference; but I really think that English people did not grovel before a title so abjectly twenty years ago as they do now—and I grew accustomed to overhear the familiar whisper,—

"A Count, my dear, in his own country, and here too, if he chooses to enjoy the title, of most distinguished Polish family."

"Enjoy the title." What a wonderful expression! Does a Duke awake in the morning and begin to smack his lips when a valet says "Your Grace?" Does he stand before his title as before a picture, catching it in different lights? Does he turn the name about as a jewel of many facets, pleasing his eyes with the lustre? I have tried to imagine all the sensual delights possible to be got out of an acknowledged Countship, were one independent enough to bear it openly, and I have always failed.

My lessons were given in the morning, so that I had the more time for Celia. Long before this I had become a son of the house at the Tyrrells. I came and went unnoticed; it was not thought necessary to improve the family tea or supper on my account; no cakes and muffins were provided, and the decanters were not produced in my honour. That was very pleasant. Also it was an understood thing that I was Celia's companion, guardian, duenna, watch-dog—anything. "It is a great comfort," said her mother, "to feel that she is with Ladislas. He is so steady."

In those days there were no choral societies, madrigal unions, or part-singing in our town. Girls sang duets, but young men seldom took any trouble to cultivate their voices, and unless sometimes when, under pressure, they attempted ambitious things set for high tenor voices, like "Good-bye, Sweetheart," or "Ever of Thee," wreaking a wicked will upon time and tune, they never sang at all. Musical young men, as they were called, were looked upon with a little disfavour as likely to turn out badly. Therefore it was a novelty in our small circle when Celia and I sang duets.

She learned to play, not brilliantly—perhaps from some defect in my teaching power—but softly and delicately, as if she loved what she played. She had the power of bringing out fresh sweetnesses, such as I had never felt in my own playing of the same piece. It is so always in the highest music. Play it a hundred times, exhaust, as you think, every chord of passion, yearning, faith, prayer, and hope, teach yourself to believe that it is a landscape which you have studied under a thousand effects of light and shade until you know its every possible aspect. Another plays it. Lo! on every side you discern hitherto undiscovered glades of sweet greenery arched by great cathedral aisles in which birds sing endless songs of praise; and clear before you, erewhile so dark and doubtful, lies the path which leads to the higher world, a sunny lane planted by loving hands with flowers, bordered with honeysuckle and meadowsweet, stretching broad and bright to the Gates of Emerald. The best thing about being a musician is that you can understand the music of others.

I encouraged Celia to play only from the best composers, because, while we have the best music to teach us, and the best poetry to speak our thoughts for us, it seems so great a sin to waste ourselves upon lower and ignoble things.

In course of time I began to essay little things of my own: feeble flights, imitations, echoes of the masters. Celia played them, praised them, and then went back to the masters. This showed me what a mere apprentice I was. For that matter I am not yet out of my articles.

Sometimes, after playing one of my own studies, it would please us to see Mrs. Tyrrell waking up out of the doze in which she spent most of her afternoons, and nod her head placidly.

"That is a very pretty piece of Mozart, Celia. I always liked that movement."

Or; "that has always been my favourite in Mendelssohn."

Why is it that people should take shame to themselves for not understanding music, and cover themselves with ignominy by the pretence? No one is ashamed to say that he does not know Hebrew or mathematics. And yet, unless one goes through the regular mill, how can music be known any more than mathematics?

Mrs. Tyrrell reminded me of those fakeers, or yogis, who attain to Heaven by perpetually gazing upon a particular toe. She spent her afternoons in a motionless contemplation of the work which she held in her hands. From time to time her eyes closed, but only for a few moments, when the lazy eyelid lifted, and her limpid eyes, which were like the eyes of fallow-deer for absence of care, rested again upon the work. A gentle, easy, emotionless woman, who could not understand her bright and eager daughter. A good woman, too, and a kind mother, always careful that her Celia had the best.

We were at that age when the soul is charged with uncertain longings. Youth is the time when poetry has the greatest power over us. There are so many things we have to say; our thoughts fly here and there like a young bird in early summer, not aimlessly but without control; the brain has not been forced into a single groove, and hardened by long continuance in that groove; the ways of the world are all open. There is no relief in speech, because, for such thoughts, the tongue is powerless. Therefore one falls back upon poetry. It makes me sad now to think of the days when our minds, saturated with the winged words of Keats, Byron, or Wordsworth, were as full of clouded visions, sunlit, mist-coloured, crossed with gleams of glory, as any picture by Turner. Where are they gone, the dreams of youth? "Où est la neige d'antan?" For if, in the after years, one such vision comes, evoked for a few moments by the breath of some mighty music, it is but a passing gleam. The fierce noontide light of midday soon disperses the clouds, and gathers up the mists. Perhaps, when evening falls upon us, they will come again, those glimpses of the better world.

We wandered hand-in-hand, a pair of dreaming children, or sat in Celia's Arbour, gazing out upon the broad bosom of the harbour. From the moat below us, which was the practice-ground of young buglers, trumpeters, and drummers, there came blown about by the breeze, the reveille, the call to retreat, the charge, and the eager rub-dub of the drum, which somehow acts so strongly upon the fighting nerves of the soldier. And every day in that busy port there was the firing of salutes, the solemn Dead March for a regimental funeral, with the quick rattle of muskets over his grave, the band of a regiment marching through the streets, and the booming of artillery practice, sounds to remind us of the world outside, to which we did not belong, but which fired our imagination.

And many kinds of life. At the end of the grassy meadow before our feet was a gate leading into the upper end of the Dockyard. Through the gate streamed the Liberty men, like schoolboys at play. And after them, going along as slowly as they possibly could, would be sometimes driven a file of wretched convicts, spade in hand, to dig and entrench in some of the Government works. There was a horrible fascination in looking at the convicts. What crimes had they committed? Why were they unhappy above other men who had sinned and not been found out? What miserable mothers and sisters mourned somewhere their degradation? How could they bear the grey uniform of disgrace, the horrible companionship of criminals, the wretched life on the hulks? Which were the men whose time was almost up, and how would they meet their release, and the return to a world which for ever afterwards would scorn them?

Sentiment all this, perhaps; it is the unhappy thing about us all when we pass into the work time, and youth's brief holiday is over that we have no more sentiment, which is often but another name for sympathy. Men try to crystallise themselves into critics, and therefore put themselves as much as they can outside the emotions. That is what makes poets, novelists, and painters hate and detest the métier of critic.

Meantime, no news of Leonard. We knew that there could be none, and yet we hoped. Leonard, of course, would keep his word. He would not write for five years; but yet, perhaps, in some indirect way, there might come news about him.

"I wonder in what way, Laddy? Of course he will be successful. Sometimes I think he is in London, writing poetry. Suppose he is already a great poet, everybody buying his wonderful verses?"

This was an extreme view to take, but then we were quite ignorant of publishing, and thought, perhaps, that a poet sprang ready made into existence and popularity. However, on cooler thoughts, the idea of Leonard taking to poetry did not commend itself to me.

"He may have gone to the Bar, Laddy, and be a great advocate."

It certainly did occur to me that advocates are seldom great at one or two and twenty.

"Or perhaps he may have become a merchant prince. Not a small trader, you know, but a great man, with fleets of ships and armies of clerks."

We breathed faster and looked at each other with flushed cheeks. What success was too great for our hero?

"Laddy," Celia went on sagely, "we must not choose, because we might be disappointed. Then Leonard would see the disappointment in our faces, and that would hurt him. We must wait—and hope. Patience, Laddy."

"Patience, Cis."

It was some proof of the strength of Leonard's character that everybody believed in his success. This young hero had gone forth to conquer the world. There would be no difficulties for him. Celia and I naturally looked upon him, our elder playfellow, with the respect of those who had been children with him, and younger than himself. This kind of feeling never dies out. The opinions of childhood throw out roots which spread all through the after years, and cling round the heart of eighty as much as round the heart of ten. And to this day I regard Leonard, just as I used to, as a being quite superior to myself.

The Captain openly spoke of him as of one who had gone into the world to show what a man might do in it. Mr. Tyrrell, who was not naturally an enthusiastic man, would congratulate the Captain on the success of the boy. And Mrs. Tyrrell—how that good lady managed to be infected by the general enthusiasm I do not know—quoted Leonard as an example, when she felt inclined to moralise, of what Religion and industry will effect for young people. What she thought they had done for Leonard I do not know. Perhaps she pictured him in a Bishop's apron. As for Mrs. Jeram, who also fell into the popular delusion, she openly thanked Providence for bringing such a boy into the world. She always knew, she said, by those infallible signs which only experienced persons can detect, that the baby—meaning Leonard—was going to be a great man.

There were others, too. The Rev. Mr. Bmughton, when he met the Captain or myself, would invite us to go home with him and drink Leonard's health in a glass of curious brown sherry, adding that he always knew that boy would get on. And Mrs. Pontifex once warned us solemnly against the pride that comes of worldly success.

All this was very delightful, and helped to keep us in a glow of pride and pleasure which made the long five years pass away quickly. There was only one discordant voice. It came from Herr Rädmer, who lodged with the Bramblers, whose acquaintance I had now made.

"You think," he said, in his German accent, "that this—what do you call him?—this boy has become a great man. What do you know about it? Nothing. What can a boy do without money and without friends? Nothing. He is some poor clerk in a merchant's office; he is a shopman behind a counter; he is an usher in a school; he has gone to Australia, and is a wretched shepherd. What else can a poor boy become? Great man! Bah! you are all fools together, Ladislas Pulaski. But go on, go on, if it will make you happy, go on till you find out the truth."

THE big fire, which was to have burnt down all Dieppe, and with a strong wind would infallibly have done so, has had little more effect after all than to give the inhabitants a wholesome scare. It consumed the principal storehouse of oil, coal, wood, and bread, which heterogenous articles are or were jumbled together in one large dépôt kept by a certain M. de Bosson. But the effect even of this loss is extremely slight in this curious town, governed as it is by economic principles of a special and peculiar sort. Adam Smith, who was fond of borrowing his illustrations from out-of-the-way places, would most certainly have carried away a number from Dieppe if he had ever stayed here for a fortnight, or, still more certainly, if he could stay here for a few days now. Seldom have the laws of supply and demand, the relations between the consumer and the producer of food, and, in short, the whole set of causes and influences which affect the "price of coromeditica," been so quickly and thoroughly bouleversés and upset as in this Norman seaport. When, in a street half a mile long, a brace of partridges will sell for six shillings at one end of it, and for three shillings at the other; when you may bathe for nothing all along the beach, except in one short strip, and then have to pay about a shilling to do so; it is pretty clear that some curious disturbing cause has been at work with the local laws of political economy.

The real fact is that Dieppe, like several other of the French seaside places, and perhaps a few English, is essentially a double-faced town, not only locally and geographically speaking, but socially, morally, and, above all, economically—it is a new town grafted on an old. The great shoals of fashionables and quasi-fashionables, of monde and demi-monde, which invade the town in summer, raise to an exorbitant level the price of house rent, table d'hôte, meat, poultry, and a number of other things, leaving at the same time others to maintain their ancient and normal market value. The ingenuous stranger finds Dieppe a very dear place—dearer than Paris or London. The natives and acclimatised foreigners grumble continually at the rising prices, but do not, nevertheless, pay much more for their purchases than they would at Yvetot or Rouen. They know that there is generally one price for them and another for the ubiquitous visitor; and they are well aware how and where to discover the one and to avoid the other. Their art may in the main be summed up in two maxims—never to buy anything in a shop, and never to give what the vendor asks.

Shops may be called almost a superfluity at Dieppe. They exist, and their owners pay rent, and it is to be supposed accordingly that they occasionally sell some of their wares. But if they depended upon their countrymen and fellow-citizens for custom they would not escape bankruptcy very long. I have been here nearly a fortnight, and have passed at least twice every day a few of these same shops. One of them belongs to a confectioner, another to a dealer in ivory, and a third to a vendor of antiquities, and as I have a strongly developed taste for each and all of these several commodities, I have naturally observed with some attention the panorama offered by the three shop windows, and the result is a conviction that a great majority of the cakes, almost all the ivory crucifixes, and every one of the antiquities, have remained untouched for the twelve days. The ivory dealers in the place labour under the mistaken, though not altogether unnatural, idea that they have a sort of monopoly in their trade. No guide-book to Dieppe was ever printed or written in which it was not averred that the Dieppois are celebrated for their manufactures and workers in ivory. The intelligent tourist is in nine cases out of ten perfectly well aware of this prestige in which the good town exults. Usually he has a vague notion that he ought to buy some sort of ivory keepsake; and with this idea goes into an ivory shop. Probably, if the shopkeeper charged him anything like a reasonable price, he would purchase a large paper knife, or even a statuette. But when he finds that the price proposed to him is considerably higher than it would be in the Soho Bazaar or in the Passage des Princes, he thinks it almost as well to buy the thing in London or Paris, and to make believe, with the aid of a little imagination, that it was brought back from the Norman town. If the would-be purchaser happens moreover to be English, it is rather discouraging to find amongst the knick-knacks on the counter ivory work which is palpably and indubitably of Birmingham manufacture. On the whole, therefore, the ivory shops cannot, any more than the others, be described as doing a very flourishing business. There is one, and one only, place where trade in Dieppe holds up its head with pride, and that is the market on market day.

Dieppe market on a Saturday is something like a market—more like it even than the German towns used to be on a Sunday, or the Russian towns at the time of the fair. The broad roads which lead from Rouen and Arques and Eu, are encumbered from sunrise to sunset with pilgrims innumerable. Every sort of cart, and every sort of pedestrian, is to be seen plodding into the town; and the men at the octroi have a grievous time of it levying the heavy duties which since the war have to be paid. From all that wide flat plain, which two thousand years ago was under the sea, which was a mere swamp when Henri IV. gained his great battle beside the neighbouring forest of Arques, but which is now dotted with thousands of the Normandy cattle, comes a supply of butter and cream cheeses worthy of Gargantuan appetites. From the hundreds of small homesteads and hamlets which lie sprinkled over the hillsides come countless multitudes of eggs packed in the corners of fat baskets, and between the interstices of less fat chickens and ducks. In the market-place, beside the grand but disorderly-looking church of St. Jacques, where six years and a half ago I saw the Prussian troops defile into the town, the whole army of peaceable country folks is now drawn up every Saturday morning. In the front row facing the Grande Rue is the long rank and file of butter women, standing in as regular order as if marshalled by the drill sergeant. For hours they stand still in patient expectation, each woman armed with the basket that hangs in front of her. Behind, in the second row, is the long and more straggling row of poultrymen and poultrywomen, their large baskets stretched upon the ground, and the live fowls fettered two and two together squatting discontentedly on the hard flagstones. Geese and ducks, turkeys and tame rabbits, are all huddled together in happy, or rather unhappy, families, awaiting the verdict which is to consign them to the spit or oven, or grant them a respite of another week. Now that the chasse has begun, there is a narrow row of hares, leverets, partridges, and quail, not without an occasional thrush. Not a grand show this, though; for the poachers have been in great force again, and there is as usual "not much game this year." Beyond is a heterogeneous army of goods for sale; clothing of all sorts, from great coats and dressing gowns down to boots, bathing shoes and stockings; jars and basins, old iron, blankets, chairs, and the paraphernalia of the Cheap Jack. Behind all is the fruit, vegetable, and flower department. M. Racine, the horticulteur, is to the fore no doubt. It seems only the other day that he enthusiastically presented M. Thiers with a bouquet "as big as himself." The illustrious visitor has passed away from Dieppe and from France; but the horticulteur remains, and will continue to flavour his occupation in the garden with an undiminished zest for Republican politics.

It is in this market-place that the good people of Dieppe make their provision for the whole week. The supplies brought in by the peasants are gradually transferred from their baskets to the baskets of the bourgeois, and during the process give rise to an amount of commotion and gesticulation which must be heard and seen to be believed in. The market woman, like the town, has two faces, and will assume the purchaser to be a stranger, or, in other words, a fool, until he or she has made a proof of some acquaintance with the customs and habits of the place. That evidence having once been produced, the scene changes in a miraculous fashion. The goose, for which it was "impossible" to take less than eight francs, changes owners at five-and-a-half francs; and the market woman, who had the air of a Covent Garden fruiterer, seems suddenly to remember that after all Dieppe is a mere country town, and that it is something to get double the price which can be got a little further inland, without standing out in the determination to get triple.

THE READER

IN the "Life and Times of the Right Hon. Sir Ralph Sadleir, Knight Banneret" (Longmans and Co.), his descendant, Major F. Sadleir Stoney, R.A., has given us a very complete memoir—albeit a little overweighted by the effort to combine with "the life" a condensed history of "the times"—of an almost typical example of the brave astute soldier-statesmen of the Tudor reigns. To the quaint biographical notices of good Sir Ralph in Lloyd and Fuller, to the more finished memoir appended by Sir W. Scott to the Clifford Edition of the Sadleir letters in 1809, research among recently published State papers has enabled Major Stoney to add many interesting particulars. And well, no doubt, does the career of his famous ancestor deserve such careful study. Born just two years before the accession of "Bluff King Hal," first ushered into public life by Wolsey's Cromwell, last figuring on its stage as one of the Commissioners who sent Mary Stuart to the block, Ralph Sadleir passed through all the heat and turmoil of the Reformation era—a statesman second only to the very first. An honesty which was above reproach, and courage which had gained at Pinkie the rare honour of knighthood on the field were tempered in his case with no small share of the wisdom of the serpent. The fall of his first patron diminished nothing of the favour in which he stood with the king, "who understood," says Lloyd, "two things—(1) a man, (2) a piece of meat, and was seldom deceived in either," and who had singled him out while yet in Cromwell's household. The accession of Queen Mary left the Privy Councillor, who had helped to put down the Catholics of the North and had even subscribed Northumberland's "device," free to enjoy his many manors and his hawking. Elizabeth found him well content to be plain Ralph Sadleir still, and "the richest commoner in England." "He saw," to quote Lloyd once more, "the interest of the State altered six times, and died an honest man; the crown put upon four heads, yet he continued a faithful subject; religion changed, as to the public constitution of it, five times, yet he kept the faith." The truth seems to be that he was a loyal servant, who never aspired to play the master. His chiefest work in war or diplomacy was in Scottish matters; his greatest merit to have been among the first to foresee, and the most diligent to pave the way for, the future union of the two kingdoms. Nor was this work light in war or peace, in Border battle or in troublous journey through the Catholic North and the half-hostile Scottish Lowlands, and perilous lodging—ambassadors' persons not being always sacred—in Edinburgh or Tantallon; and highly interesting are the letters in which the accomplished Southern knight and scholar describes his doings in the wild and barbarous North. Altogether, the eighty years in which Sir Ralph accumulated wealth and honours till laid to rest in Standon Church—the Scottish standard captured by him at Pinkie hung above his tomb—were among the most stirring in our history, and for the part the wise old statesman played in them we can thoroughly commend the reader to Major Stoney's most painstaking monograph.

Vol. II. of "Modern Birmingham and its Institutions" (Osborne, Birmingham; Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., London), or the history of the Hardware Town for the twenty years from 1851 to 1871, brings to a close Dr. J. A. Langford's labours as chronicler of the civic life of the "metropolis of the Midlands." A compilation like its predecessor, though a very careful one, from official minutes and newspaper reports, and, like it, addressed almost exclusively to Birmingham readers, it is even for these a work more fitted for consultation now and then than for continuous perusal. Still, in a centre of such vigorous local life, there will be always something of a wider, almost national, interest, as here in the story of Birmingham Free Parks, City Missions, and Reformatories, or in the occasional "obituary" of some little known but rarely gifted man, such as (to take one instance only) the American inventor, Dr. Williaro Church. A volume in fine which, though not to be commended to amusement-seeking readers, and somewhat too much given, even for a municipal record, to "small-beer" chronicles, as a book of reference for the student of local history, already possesses considerable, and with years must acquire an increasing value.

The "second edition greatly extended and improved" affixed to "Origin and Migrations of the Polynesian Nation" (S. Low and Co.), by the Rev. J. D. Lang, D.D., a gentleman possibly better known as colonist, politician, and historian than as ethnologist, refers, we gather from further perusal, to a first brochure published forty-three years ago—beyond in fact the memory of most living readers—in which Dr. Lang's then brand-new theories of the Malayan origin of the American Indian as of the Polynesian tribes, and of the colonisation of island after island by groups caught in westerly storms, till from lone Easter Isle the last batch made their way to the coast of Chili, there to become the ancestors of future Incas, Aztecs, and Iroquois, appeared only to be snapped up and pirated by the Rev. Mr. Ellis, "the Apostle of Madagascar," in the new edition of his well-known "Polynesian Researches." How far the vexed question of the origin of the American tribes may be regarded as disposed of on the three grounds then first, as Dr. Lang asserts, enunciated, and now once more re-stated and illustrated—the Malayan origin of the Polynesian races; the existence in the South Pacific of zones of westerly storms blowing counter for weeks together to the prevailing trade winds; and the curious affinities in language, rites, and architecture, of the first settlers in the Pacific islands with the early peoples of Mexico and Peru we must leave to scientific ethnologists to decide. On all these points Dr. Lang adduces many curious facts, however short they may fall as a whole of the cumulative evidence necessary to build up his general conclusion.

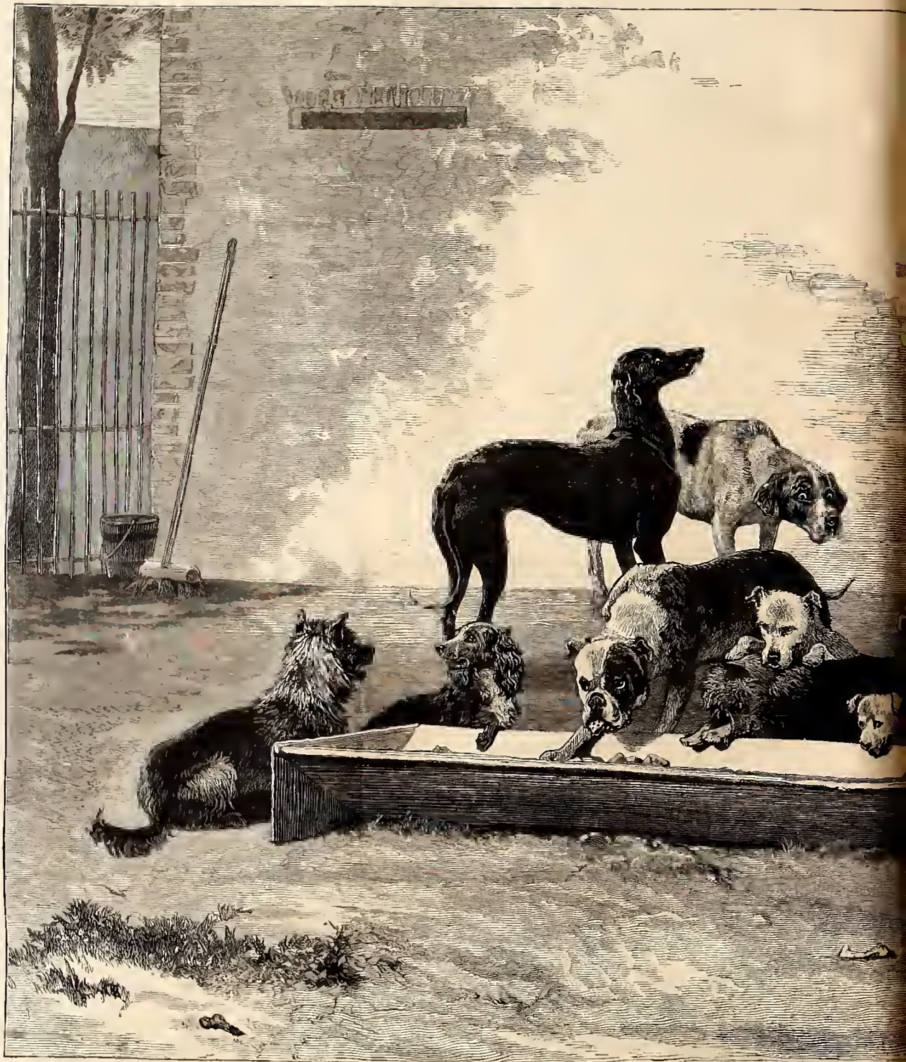
"A Note on Charlotte Brontë," by A. C. Swinburne (Chatto and Windus).—Mr. Swinburne's "Note" appears to have been called forth by a review in the Spectator of Nov. 11th, 1876, of Mr. Wemyss Reid's interesting memoir of Charlotte Brontë, a work which Mr. Swinburne, more suo, designates a "priceless contribution to our knowledge of one of the greatest among women." The reviewer gave it as his opinion that the works of the author of "Jane Eyre" "will one day again be regarded as evidences of exceptional intellectual power." Most sober-minded persons, so far from seeing anything amiss in the phrase, would consider it well-chosen and to the purpose, but to Mr. Swinburne it seems a deliberate damning with faint praise works whose destiny will be "to be read with delight and wonder, and re-read with reverence and admiration, when darkness everlasting has long since fallen upon all human memory of the cheap scientific, the vulgar erotic, and the voluminous domestic schools" of fiction. And in a torrent of what we can only call rant and rhapsody he proceeds, at considerable length, to pour forth his passionate admiration for Charlotte Brontë, who, with her sister Emily and Mrs. Browning, "make up," according to him, "the perfect Trinity for England of highest female fame." As Mr. Swinburne has little or no new light to throw on the novels of the Brontë sisters one might be puzzled to understand why he should have felt his "Note" called for, did it not soon become manifest that a main object with him in penning it was to utter an angry protest against the homage paid to George Eliot, whom he insists on regarding as "Charlotte Brontë's chosen rival." We should very much doubt if the notion of any particular "rivalry" existing between the two had ever entered the head of anybody but himself. The novels of Charlotte Brontë, he declares, show pure genius; those of her "rival" only great intellect. The finest among the characters in the former are "creations;" in the latter no more than "constructions." Of course Mr. Swinburne has a moral right to think so, and say so, if he pleases, though he will not persuade many people to agree with him, but his heat about the matter is altogether unnecessary, and, indeed, weakens the effect of his arguments—or what he puts forward for such. Mr. Swinburne has before now shown himself a fine critic, but his perceptions are not to be trusted on any subject that rouses his feelings.

While waiting still for that revised version which shall definitely supersede our present Bible, we may welcome at once as a substitute and a preparative the "Revised English Bible" (Eyre and Spottiswoode), presented to us by J. G. in the name of four well-known scholars. Though hardly so bold in all its changes as will be the offspring of the Revising Committee, it does ample justice on the mistranslations (often purely unintelligible) of the poetic books of the Old Testament in the Bible of King James, no less than to the textual changes which modern criticism has rendered necessary in the New. Hardly, indeed, is it too much to say that to ordinary readers the force and drift of chapter upon chapter of ancient prophecy will dawn for the first time after perusal of its renderings. An occasional phrase of modern form where modernising was not necessary to the sense is the one defect—not, however, a slight one—we have noticed.

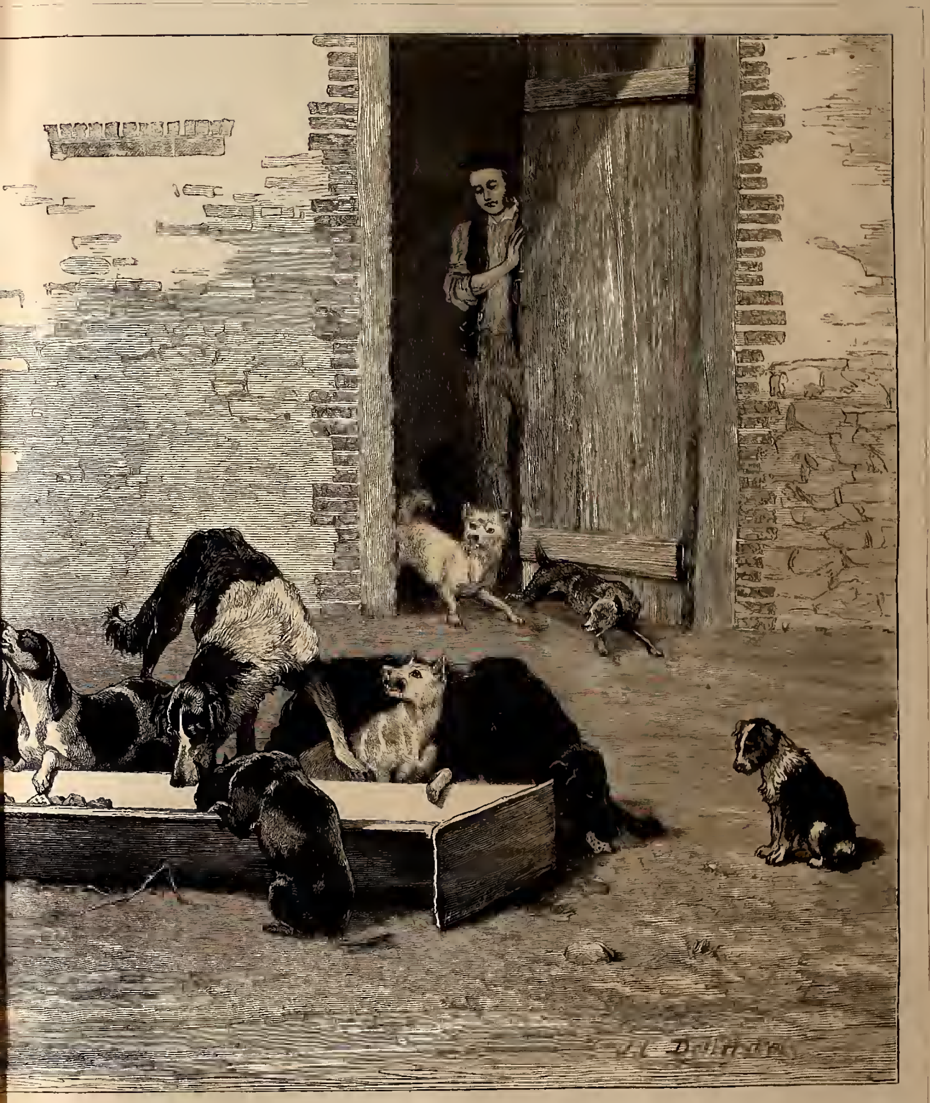
Ere yet the waning tourist season closes, a pair of shilling guide-books seem to merit more than common praise—the one a prettily illustrated handbook to the beauties of the Peak district, entitled "The Matlock Companion" (Virtue and Co.), by Llewellyn Jewitt, F.S.A.; the other the "Midland Great Western Railway Guide to Connemara and the West of Ireland" (R. M. Cameron, Edinburgh and Broadstone Terminus). The maps and skeleton tours to accompany this last are exceedingly well designed, bold yet accurate, and with suggestions of cosy inns and road-side accommodation quite startling to an Irish traveller of thirty years since. We only hope the word of promise is duly kept. There would be few pleasanter rambles than around Clew Bay or on the skirts of Erris could one but get one fine day in three, and be fairly at ease about the chance of shelter for the night.

"Practical Lessons in Painting on China," by Mme. la Baronne Delamardelle, a diminutive little manual, with a grandiloquent preface by M. F. Goupil, of the Sevres Manufactory (Lechertier, Barbe, and Co., Regent Street), seems partly intended to recommend the tube colours of M. Lacroix. It contains, however, a fair series of useful lessons for those who have a mind to paint their own porcelain.

The steady progress of works of charity in London may be traced as strongly as ever in the two excellent little volumes, "Low's Hand-book to the Charities of London" (S. Low and Co.), edited and revised to August, 1877, by C. Mackeson, F.S.S.; and "The Royal Guide to the London Charities for 1877-78," by Herbert Fry (Hardwicke and Bogue). Even while "War in the East Relief Funds," "Indian Famine Relief Funds," and so forth, are claiming all our superfluous cash, we find from such addenda as an "Invalid's Home Association," or a "Kyrle Society," to supply a collection of sea-weed, shells and artistic objects for poor homes and sick room, that domestic benevolence still strikes out new channels for its tranquil flow. We are glad too to note in the preface to either hand-book an absence of the antagonism observable last year between the older and smaller charities and certain new and slightly aggressive "organisations." There is clearly room for all to work without doing danger to one another.



A TABLE D'HÔTE AT THE HOM



E FOR LOST DOGS, BATTERSEA

"ANNETTE," by the author of "The Blue Ribbon," &c. (2 vols. : Hurst and Blackett).—There is much that is good in this book, though, in common with most of the author's stories, it suffers from being constructed out of too slight materials. Though there are but two volumes of it, it shows signs of padding. But Miss Brown, the sturdy, kind-hearted, and helpful old maid, who tells the story, is thoroughly well-conceived and natural, and reminds us often of some of Mr. Edward Garrett's characters when he is most genial and at his best. We meet her first on board the steamer Nawab, when she is homeward bound, after twenty years of Zenana work in India—work the aim of which was not so much the conversion of Hindoo women as the improvement of their moral and social condition—to spend the evening of her days in her native town of Abbotsby. Here she encounters the heroine, Annette Lislethorpe, who is suffering severely from trouble of mind and acute sea-sickness, and forthwith constitutes herself her friend and protector. We have no doubt that Annette is as sweet a creature as we are assured, but we cannot help feeling her rather weak and silly. Had she consistently pined away on account of the supposed faithlessness of her young lover her rôle would have been too legitimate for us to take exception to it, but as she recovers sufficiently to give her hand and a fair portion of her heart to Gregory Justin, the wealthy and distinguished Recorder of Abbotsby—another passenger by the Nawab—there seems no particular reason why she should fade out of life from want of enough interest in it to hold it fast, simply because her husband, a clever and ambitious man of middle age, is so occupied with his official duties and his essays on the ventilation of public buildings that he spends but little time by her side. She does but fare as the wives of busy men must expect to fare. Still, we like her well enough to be sorry for her, in spite of what we consider the unreasonableness of her trouble, and this sympathy is a proof that the author must have drawn her with some skill. The everyday life on board the Nawab is sketched very amusingly, and shows a thorough acquaintance with what life in a "P. and O." steamer is wont to be. The author very happily describes the position of the two great ladies of the ship, who as colonels' wives consider themselves too grand to mix with the rest of the passengers, and are debarred from each other's society through a deadly feud as to precedence, and "thus, shut out by pique from each other, and by position from every one else, they remain apart, each a solitary island in the ocean of her own dignity." Miss Brown's two old servants at Abbotsby, Karen and Hilary, and "Stump," the workhouse girl, whose first feelings so evidently were that her mistress must be a very selfish and, indeed, unprincipled woman to think of requiring "such an unlimited number of plates, knives, and forks, and such ample accommodation in the matter of space, to say nothing of two women to fetch and carry for me, and a pump to my sole and separate use," are all excellent. In fact the book is always best whenever Miss Brown, with her own opinions and belongings, becomes most prominent.

"The Tame Turk," by Olive Harper (3 vols. : Tinsley).—We are much afraid that Olmas-Sai, the "Tame Turk" who is the hero of this story, must have been playing with the credulity of the worthy lady who tells us she had the narrative of his adventures from his own lips. He informed her that his father was a French nobleman, the Marquis d'Auteuil, who had been an aide-de-camp to the great Napoleon. Once, when "the great immortal was hungry," and there was nothing to be had to eat, the Marquis was lucky enough to find a woman who had four eggs, which he and "an eminent general," after buying "at a fabulous price," prepared with their own hands, "cooking them with bank-notes of the value of 4,000 napoleons. (Olmas-Sai must have been reading "Codlingsby." "'My lord's pipe is out,' said Miriam, and, taking a 50*l.* note from the mantel-piece, she proceeded to rekindle Lord Codlingsby's chibouque.") Subsequently the Marquis had all his toes frozen off at Moscow; but this misfortune seems neither to have impaired his bodily activity or diminished his attractiveness. After the fall of the Emperor he took service with Sultan Mahmoud, with whom he soon became a prime favourite, devoting himself to improving the condition of the Turkish army. In the gardens of the palace he encountered the Sultan's sister (we must have been mistaken, we suppose, in our impressions as to the seclusion of Turkish women), whom he instructed in "the sweet but simple lays of his native land," and the pair became devotedly attached to each other. The Sultan made no great opposition to the union of the lovers, only stipulating that the bridegroom should become a Mahomedan, "a condition which was not hard." Of this marriage Olmas-Sai and an elder brother, Nicolo, were the issue. The author takes the opportunity of setting her readers right as to a misconception which, she thinks, is prevalent, "that it is obligatory on a Turk to marry four wives. He may, but he need not unless he likes." From a very early age the adventures of Olmas-Sai, both in love and war, are passing strange, but we cannot attempt here to follow them. The author appears to find no difficulty in any of them; her robust faith is not staggered even by the most stupendous of all, the hero's ride, during the Crimean War, in which he plays a distinguished part, from Shumla to Constantinople as the bearer of important despatches from Omar Pasha. His seven horses are led to the door, he mounts one, and is "off like the wind," the other six being trained to follow, so that he may always be able to mount a fresh (!) horse as his steeds are tired out. It is little wonder that when he at noon the next day at last draws rein and dismounts at the Turkish War Office in Constantinople, after having accomplished "in twenty-eight hours and twelve minutes what is called a ride of forty-eight hours," his seventh and last horse, which has, of course, been on the gallop all the time, apparently without food or water, should have "whirled round two or three times and dropped dead." It will thus be seen that however "tame" may be the Turk himself, his adventures do not deserve this epithet. It may be, perhaps, that some of them do not give an over highly-coloured picture of life in Turkey and the Levant, and, at any rate, readers whose taste does not revolt too much from the marvellous may find them amusing. We must add that the style of the book would often lead us to suppose it a not very well executed translation from a French original.

"The Burthen of Reuben," by Mrs. Randolph, author of "Wild Hyacinth," &c. (3 vols. : Hurst and Blackett).—It is one Harold Raby who is the "Reuben" in this case, and his "burthen" is, of course, his own fickleness and instability of purpose. But, as we do not feel that close personal interest in him that Jacob did in his first-born, his systematic failure to excel does not succeed in arousing our sympathies. Indeed, we do not see why we should be asked to follow the fortunes of such an exceedingly weak and commonplace young man, whose only attractive quality is a certain easy good nature. As there is, perhaps, rather more than the ordinary share of love-making in this story it is satisfactory to note that it is all of a perfectly legitimate character. Mrs. Randolph's novels are seldom without some slightly humorous touches, and we have them here in the person of the lady of bewildered mind, who is the unstable one's mother, and thinks that "everybody must understand farming; it's only just having the land ploughed, and the seed put in, and then waiting till the corn is ripe, and having it cut in time for partridge-shooting," and in that of the sentimental and "gushing" elderly spinster, who, as a girl, has unfortunately heard herself spoken of as "sympathetic and of quick intelligence," and is for ever trying to look the character. The book is not unreadable, but it is a great deal too long.

"Touch Not the Nettle," by Alec Fearon (Samuel Tinsley).—After closing this book we are still unable to say what is "the nettle," and who it is that had better have left it untouched. Nevertheless, as novels go, it is a story of some merit, and the heroine, Effie Garstin, possesses more force and originality of character than ordinarily falls to the lot of the heroines of such tales. The worst fault in it is a bit of perfectly outrageous sensationalism. A High Church clergyman, who has preached the celibacy of the priesthood, falls in love with his beautiful parishioner, Effie, and, after many struggles against this weakness of the flesh, succumbs, and asks her to marry him. On her refusal, he goes out of his senses, and is found in his study, with the Bible before him, open at the eighteenth chapter of St. Matthew, and a razor in his hand, with which he has actually cut off his right hand, and done his best to cut out his right eye. But, bad as this blot is, it is no more than a blot.

THE FOLK-LORE OF HARES

> 'Tis the worst luck in the world to stir a witch.
> PEELE'S Edward I.

OF all our innocent, simple animals none, it might be thought, would be so little liable to become a familiar of superstition as the timorous hare. Yet at all times and in most countries it has enjoyed an evil repute. It is curious that Shakespeare forgot to mix its ears or eyes with the ingredients of his witches' caldron, but then his poaching tastes had led him rather to Sir T. Lucy's deer. At all events, he knew the hare's disposition,—

> You are the hare of whom the proverb goes,
> Whose valour plucks dead lions by the beard.

Izaak Walton mentions another piece of folk-lore, that hares change their sexes annually. Its main celebrity, however, in the Black Art arises from its unlucky nature, and from its being reputed a favourite animal for witches' cantrips. "Come with us," writes Christopher North, "and course an animal that never heard a city bell—by day a hare, by night an old woman." Both these notions, which on any other hypothesis are very difficult to be accounted for, probably arose from a belief which has prevailed very generally, but, as far as we know, without any reason, that its flesh forms unhealthy food.

So early as the time of Moses the prejudice had established itself. The hare was classed by him amongst unclean animals because it chewed the cud without dividing the hoof. It is hardly necessary to state that this is an entire misconception, due to ignorance of anatomy (which would at once have shown the Jews that the creature did not possess the four stomachs of a ruminant), and the curious motions of its lips, which might strike a superficial observer as being similar to the circular chewing of the cud seen in cows. In reality this perpetual movement of the hare and rabbit's jaws is part of a providential arrangement whereby their incisor teeth are gradually ground down and kept in serviceable order. This prejudice against eating the flesh of the hare is not shared by the modern Arabs, but the Turks and Armenians, and especially the Parsees, abominate it. The Arabs choose to esteem it clean because it chews the cud, without paying any attention to the other requisite of the precept. Greeks and Romans ate it, spite of a prevalent opinion that it was not very wholesome. It is easy to conjecture that the mistake of the Jews was the original cause of the aversion some of these nations have to the hare; but what is to be said of the fact related by Cæsar, that the ancient Britons never ate it? Here, it seems, an independent superstition arises, one that cannot easily be connected with the Jewish beliefs. The French, too, have a proverb, "An old goose and an old hare are food for the devil." There is much truth in the former statement, as most people who have had the ill luck to taste a venerable goose know to their cost, but if the old hare be served as a potage, it possesses very few of the ordinary qualities attributed to a hell-broth. And if (as "Elia" recommended, a sucking-pig should be whipped to death), the oldest hare in the parish be coursed to her death—horresco referens !—no one will complain of its toughness, or need fear indigestion.

In some parts of England it is reckoned unlucky should a hare cross the path, and if one should chance to run along a frequented path or a street it is certain that a house hard by will ere long be burnt. Pliny says the flesh of a hare causes sleep, and that those who eat it look fair, lovely, and gracious for a week afterwards. Linnæus asserts that cloth made of a hare's fur preserves the wearer from fleas; while Buffon, with amazing credulity, says it is the only animal which has hair in its mouth. The extravagant gambols of hares in spring which have led to the proverb "as mad as a March hare," probably caused the old Saxons to represent their Goddess of Love as attended by hares, two acting as her trainbearers while others precede her with lights. It is not in England merely that the hare is connected in the popular mind with spring.* At Easter, in Swabia and Hesse a nest is made of moss, a hare set upon it, and the children are sent to look in it for the eggs that the hare has laid. On the Saxon mountains, too, it is said that the Easter hare brings the Easter eggs. Russian folk-lore also has a curious story bringing together eggs and hares, which it seems difficult to connect even in fancy on any reasonable principle. A many-headed snake, called Koshchei, is asked, "Whereabouts is your death, O Koshchei?" much as Dalilah tried to inveigle from Samson the secret of his strength; the hydra replied, "My death is in such and such a place. There stands an oak, and under the oak is a casket, and in the casket is a hare, and in the hare is a duck, and in the duck is an egg, and in the egg is my death." A certain Prince Joan, who is wandering in search of adventures, discovers the egg, breaks it, and at once kills Koshchei the Deathless.†

But the chief celebrity of the hare in folk-lore undoubtedly consists in its connection with witchcraft, especially the black art as believed in Scotland. Giraldus Cambrensis attributes the belief that certain old crones could turn themselves into hares, and in that shape suck cows, to the Celtic race, the natives of Wales, Ireland, and Scotland. Even so late as twenty-five years ago it was put on record that a "Scotch witch had been seen a hundred times milking the cows in the shape of a hare." Reginald Scott informs us what animals are most grateful to the powers of darkness, and naturally our quarry is amongst them; "right grave authors report that spirits most often and specially take the shape of women, appearing to monks, &c.; and of beasts, dogs, swine, horses, goats, cats, hares; of fowles, as crowes, night owles, and skreeche owles; but they delight most in the likeness of snakes and dragons." Grose is doubtful whether it is for the sake of air and exercise, or to vex the squire, justice, and parson of the village wherein they reside, that witches often transform themselves into hares, and lead hounds and huntsman a long and fruitless chase. But these beldames often had narrow escapes. As, for instance, it was deposed at the trial of Julian Cox, mentioned by Glanvil, that great believer in ghosts and demonology, that a huntsman, having fairly run down a hare, stepped before the hounds to take it up, when to his great amazement he found it was old Julian, breathless after her chase, and grovelling on the earth. The unfortunate woman was executed on this evidence in 1663.

A Scotch hag, named Isobel Gowdie, one of the celebrated Auldearn witches, confessed that at Lammas, 1659, she had attended a Witches' Sabbath, when they rambled through the country in the shapes of cats, hares, and the like.* Such changes she declared were very common amongst her uncanny sisterhood; crows, she said, were birds which they especially affected. She herself had a narrow escape once under the form of a hare. She had been sent, she averred, by the Devil to Auldearn in that disguise with some message, but had the misfortune to meet Peter Papley of Killhill's servants going to labour, having his hounds with them. The dogs sprang on the disguised witch, "and I," says Isobel, "ran a very long time, but being hard-pressed was forced to take to my own house, the door being open, and there took refuge behind a chest." But the hounds rushing in took the other side of the chest, so that Isobel only escaped by getting into another house, where she found time to say the disenchanting rhyme:

> Hare, hare! God send thee care;
> I am in a hare's likeness now,
> But I shall be woman even now,
> Hare, hare! God send thee care.

Such rencontres, she said, were not uncommon, and sometimes the witches were bitten by the dogs, and retained the marks when restored to human shape, but none were ever killed on these occasions. The readers of the Spectator will remember Moll White, the witch of Sir Roger de Coverley's village. "If a hare makes an unexpected escape from his hounds, the huntsman curses Moll White." "Nay," says Sir Roger, "I have known the master of the pack upon such an occasion send one of his servants to see if Moll White had been out that morning."

The Ettrick Shepherd relates one or two capital stories of these freaks of the witches. A number of gentlemen were one day met for a coursing match on the lands of Kirkhope in the Yarrow Valley. They had numerous and keen greyhounds, but could not find a hare. At last a boy came up, who offered to start a hare for them, if they would give him a guinea and suffer him to hold the black greyhound. The demand was singular, but no other conditions would satisfy him. So the price was paid; the hare was at once found and gave excellent sport. The greyhounds began to give up one by one, so long did the "maukin" run, when one of the party came slyly behind the boy and cut the leash which held the black dog. Away it flew to join in the chase. The boy, losing his presence of mind, ran bawling with great anxiety, "Hay, mither, rin! Hay, rin, ye auld witch, if ever ye ran i' yer life! Rin, mither, rin!" Meanwhile the black dog came fast up to his quarry, and was beginning to "mouth" her, when she sprang in at the window of a little cottage and escaped. The riders soon came to the place and entered the cot in search of their hare, but nothing was found save an old woman lying panting in a bed, so breathless that she could not speak a word.

The celebrated Michael Scott of Oakwood was himself sorely victimised in this fashion, and that by one of his own tenants. This old lady (known as Lucky) was reputed to be the most notable witch of her time. Indeed so marvellous were her powers that the country people began to compare them invidiously with those of the Master, and it was averred that in some "cantrips" she could surpass him. Michael could ill brook such insinuations, so he went over one day with his dogs on pretence of hunting, but in reality with an intent to exercise some of his infernal skill in order to chastise Lucky. He found her alone in the field weeding lint, and desired her in a friendly manner to show him a sample of her powerful art. She angrily denied that she possessed any supernatural knowledge. He, however, continuing to press her, she bade him with some warmth leave her alone, or she would make him repent the day on which he troubled her. How she perceived the virtue of the Master's wand is unknown, but in a moment she snatched it from his hand, and gave him three lashes with it. Michael was immediately changed to a hare, when the malicious and inveterate hag cried out laughing, "Sbu Michael, rin or dee," and baited all his own dogs at him. He was extremely hard pushed, and was obliged to swim the river and take shelter in the sewer of his own castle from the fury of his pursuers, where he found leisure to disenchant himself, and once more appear as a man. He afterwards took an amusing vengeance on Lucky, which resulted in her death, and his being left undisputed Master of the Black Art.

The same superstition is found in Ireland. A friend was shooting there, and time after time failed to hit a particular hare which was always to be found in the same "form." "Faith, sir, and I am not surprised at it," at length quoth the gamekeeper, "she's a witch-hare, and sorra a mother's son could hit her without a crooked sixpence in his gun!" Unfortunately our friend did not try the receipt. Montaigne relates an anecdote of a young Turkish lord who had performed a notable exploit in war before Amurath, and was asked by him who at his early years had thus inspired him with such distinguished courage? His answer, and the essayist's reflection on it, are curiously applicable to our subject. "My teacher in valour," said the Turk, "was a hare. Being one day a hunting I found a hare sitting. At her I let fly my arrows, and shot forty that I had in my quiver, not only without hurting, but without starting her from her form. At last I slipped my dogs at her, but to no more purpose than I had shot, by which I understood that she had been secured by her destiny, and that neither darts nor swords can wound without the permission of Fate, which we can neither hasten nor put back." This story may serve, by the way (adds Montaigne) to let us see how flexible our reason is to all sorts of images.

We were lately walking by the upper waters of the Tweed with a friend while the skies were pouring down an autumnal deluge, when an old hag, bent double, with a projecting chin, eagle eye, and "mutch" thrown over her head after the fashion of the older Scotch peasants, met us. She leaned on an odd-looking staff, and, spite of the rain, her shawl did not appear wet. It should be added that there seemed no apparent reason for her being there, as no house was near. Simultaneously we turned and said to each other, "What a fine specimen of a witch!" The very next day, while the rain still fell in torrents, we were driving by the same river, when a hare ran blindly up the road to meet us, pursued at some distance by a black dog. The former creature was so terrified that it ran under the horse's feet, and was fatally injured. We jumped off and secured it. What wonder if we said, "This is the old witch we saw yesterday!" In the days of the Auldearn witches or of Hopkins, the English witchfinder, it would have gone hard with the old woman after such a coincidence. Without the trouble of the ordeal Nature herself would have been appealed to as declaring that, after the death of her familiar or her other self, her own execution was imperatively demanded.

Besides the ill-fame which the hare's flesh acquired with many of the ancients, another circumstance, the annual changing of the hare's colour at the approach of winter, may, in the northern countries of Europe, have contributed to the growth of the above-mentioned superstitions. We will not dwell on any more examples. It is sufficient to remark that in the Middle Ages Ignorance was always the mother of Superstition, which in her turn became the nurse of Cruelty. So that in the folk-lore of hares no one need be surprised to find extremes meeting, the mildness of that harmless animal popularly connected with grotesque and enormous wickedness.

DARK-NIGHT WORK

As daylight dwindles and the dark hours increase in number, the householder, both in town and country, will do well once again to give a little calm consideration to the question—"Is my abode, as far as human foresight can make it, so secure against the ingenious devices of those who break in and steal, and whose business season commences just about the time when the melancholy muffin bell proclaims the end of autumn?" Let him who is serenely confident in his locks and bars take heed lest some dismal morning he makes the startling discovery of an open window or a door ajar, with grease spots on the hall oilcloth and strange footprints on the stairs.

Forewarned, forearmed, is an axiom worthy of respect, and without in the least desiring to add to the nervous apprehensions of the timid head of the family, it may be as well to make mention of one of the not commonly recognised dangers to which he is subject. If there exists such a work as the "Housebreaker's Handy Book of Reference; or, the Burglar's Correct Guide," there can be no doubt that the device in question is deemed worthy of a foremost place in its criminal pages—possibly with the addition of a foot-note by the editor calling attention to the fact that "this is a dodge that every enterprising member of the profession should give special attention to, as it is known to be more profitable than any other." It is charmingly simple too, with no more trouble or fear of being interfered with than a commercial traveller seeking orders for future delivery. All that the housebreaker's agent has to do is to get up a decent appearance and go about on the look-out for eligible houses empty and to let, and permission to view, which, together with the key, may be obtained on application to some one who resides some distance off. It will happen in some cases that the person who has the letting of the house will take the precaution of sending someone along with the applicant; but more often than not he will be glad to be spared this trouble, and yield up the key on a promise that it shall be speedily returned. This being the case—and if it can be brought about but one time in six it will pay very well—all the rest is perfectly easy. Unobserved and at his leisure, the "agent," who, make no doubt, is a skilled workman in his particular line of business, goes over the house and studies its internal arrangements. He enters in his note-book the position of the servants' bed-rooms, and of the apartment which the heads of the abode will probably occupy. He pays particular attention to the fastenings of the back door, and if the lock on it is anything out of the common way his curiosity may lead him to make a cast of it with a handy bit of wax he carries with him. He has an eye to bolts and bars, and it is not impossible that he may produce a screwdriver, and, withdrawing the original screws from the fastenings, substitute "dummies" that a smart push with the shoulder from without will instantly displace. Having abundance of time on his hands, and being conscientious as to the faithful discharge of his duty to his employer, he will extend his investigation even to the coal cellar and mark how the coal-plate is secured, and he will mount to the attic and interest himself in the arrangement of the roof trap. All this duly accomplished he will politely return the key to the obliging lender, with the remark that he will probably hear from him.

It is not unlikely that this may happen, or, at all events, if the unsuspicious house agent does not again hear from the intending tenant, he will very probably hear of the doings of a friend of his, though he would never dream of the connection between the two. Really it is enough to make a poor honest man wish he were less scrupulous when he discovers how smoothly the rogue's path to plunder may be paved. All that is required is to hit on an oath of secrecy sufficiently binding to keep together the members of the bold brotherhood of house-breakers whatever the nature of the temptation to treachery that might assail them; and then, by following the simple lines above laid down, an extensive, methodical, and highly remunerative business might be done. There might be booking-clerks and ledgers, and when a "workman" had finished with one job he would have nothing to do but to apply at the proper desk of the department to which he was attached. "Here is something that may suit you, Mr. Crackitt, 55, Goldsack Square. Tenant wealthy, old bachelor, with valuables on the premises, and plenty of plate. House well examined and prepared before he took possession of it. Here is a plan of the rooms with their approaches, and here are the keys of the front and back doors. Or there is a window in the pantry fifteen inches by ten you might squeeze through. There is a chain to the hall door, but it is attached only by 'trick' screws, and will yield to a push. The bolts have all been seen to, and will give you no trouble. The commission is fifteen per cent., with eminent counsel to defend you should you be so unfortunate as to get into trouble."

This may appear to be making a joke of what is really a serious matter; but friendly warning is not the less valuable because it is conveyed with a smile. That the danger alluded to does exist there can be no doubt; indeed, it is scarcely likely that such a curiously easy way of gaining burglarious admittance into a house would be overlooked by those whose busy brains are perpetually on criminality bent. To the question of how the midnight marauder of the class indicated can be best guarded against, the answer is short and satisfactory—never rely on the important locks, however excellent may be their condition, that may be found in an—old or new—house that has stood empty before occupancy. Have them exchanged for others, or at least supplement them with reliable safety latches, and make sure that the screws of all bolts and fastenings have not been tampered with.

New Music

C. JEFFERYS.——A piquant love song for a mezzo-soprano is "Il Mio Beppin," the tuneful melody by F. Schira, the Italian words from "Tuscan Popular Songs."—Scarcely less pleasing, although of a different character, is "After Long Years," by the above-named composer; the sentimental words by E. Oxenford; compass from D below to G above the lines.—Tenors with sweet voices of limited compass will find "A Golden Dream," composed by Odoardo Barri, admirably suited to their capabilities; the words, by Rosa A. Lee, are pathetic and poetical; this song will be a leading favourite of the season.—A spirited song for a bass is "The Pirate Chief," written and composed by Emily Bond and Louis Diehl.—"To Pyrrha" is a morbid love ditty, the words adapted from Horace (Book I., Ode V.), the feeble music by Robert Little; this song goes far to prove that modern composers need a special gift to illustrate successfully the poetical ideas of ancient writers.—This special gift has been vouchsafed to Michael Watson, whose pianoforte pieces "after the antique" have little or nothing modern in them beyond their exterior; for example, "Sarabande in B flat," "Minuet in C" (antique style), and "Gigue in G," seem to belong to the bag-wig period, nevertheless they are very pleasing to modern pianistes and their audience.—"Under the Lily Bells" (Fairy Dance for the pianoforte), by the above-named composer is a showy morceau for agile fingers.—No. II. of a series of "Grand Operatic Duets," arranged by J. Rummel, consists of a well-chosen selection from Wagner's Flying Dutchman; somewhat difficult to learn, this duet will more than repay the study needed for its accomplishment.—Two meritorious drawing-room pieces for the pianoforte are "The Water Mill," by J. C. Dunster, and "The Silver Stream," by J. T. Trekell.

MESSRS. DUFF AND STEWART.——A fairly well-written song for any after-dinner festival, especially at Christmastide, is "A Toast to Other Days," the music by W. C. Levey, words by J. S. Carter.—A very useful duet for two soprani is "Spring and Summer," written and composed by B. S. Montgomery and Franz Abt; what it lacks in originality is made up for in utility. Other composers before W. C. Levey have set Mrs. Hemans' plaintive poem, "The Better Land," to music with equal success; the words alone will win favour in the home circle, there is nothing original in the music.—A clever, but dismal, song is "Under the Lamplight," by Louisa Gray.—"Come at Last," written and composed by Harriett Power and Virginia Gabriel, is a well-written song for a sentimental contralto.—Decidedly objectionable, as a rule, are words adapted to popular waltzes. An exception may be made in favour of "Loved and Lost" ("Geliebt und Verloren"), the melodious theme of which, by Otto Müller, has been set to some poetical words by Percy Fitzgerald; it would have been far better had the song been written first and the waltzes followed after.—Both words and music, by Messrs. C. J. Rowe and J. Greenhill, of "Friends for Ever" are touching in the extreme, and will please wherever they are sung.—A graceful after-dinner piece for the pianoforte is "Summer Night," a serenade by Henry Logé.

MESSRS. ROBERT COCKS AND CO.——A song from the pen of Jaques Blumenthal is always sure of a public welcome. "I Awake and Dream" is quite up to his usual high standard of excellence; contraltos will find it an acquisition to their répertoire, the words by H. F. Chorley are full of pathos.—Simple words allied to an easy and flowing melody are to be found in "Home Light," a song of medium compass for a soprano; the former are by Helen M. Burnside, the latter by Henry Smart.—A brilliant and not very difficult pianoforte piece is "Venetian March," by Frederic Lemoine.—A merry, danceable galop is "L'Eclair," by Cotsford Dick; the frontispiece is of a startling description.—Capital fun for children of all ages will be found in "A Singing Quadrille," by Cotsford Dick, composed upon many of our old nursery rhyme tunes, "Ba, Ba, Black Sheep," "Little Jack Horner," &c.—An easy and danceable set of quadrilles on popular melodies, "The English Fleet," are neatly arranged by J. Pridham.

MESSRS. J. B. CRAMER AND CO.——Of two love songs for medium tenors composed by A. D. Duvivier, "Roses on the Stream" is from a musical point of view far better than "Fare Thee Well, and if For Ever," the very pleasing words for the former are written by H. Hersee, whilst the latter is Lord Byron's beautiful and pathetic poem.—Three useful songs for every day occasions composed by C. H. R. Marriott are entitled respectively, "Jack's Bequest," words by E. Oxenford (for a mezzo-soprano), "Oh, Chide Me Not for Loving," a naïve little Scotch poem by L. M. Thornton (for a soprano), and "Sweet Rosabelle," a love poem by C. Featherstone (for a tenor).—It is not often that a Mus. Doc. condescends to write dance music; Albert Hartmann, Mus. Doc., shows a decided gift for that branch of composition, or rather adaptation, in "Deutsche Mädchen Lieder Waltz" (German Maiden Songs), which we may expect to hear very often during the present and coming season.

WILLIAM CZERNY.——Two desponding songs by Franz Abt are "Sweet Words of Comfort" and "Tears and Lilies," the German words cheerfully translated by F. Finlayson; these songs are published in two keys, and may be sung by any one who has a real or imaginary cause for depression.—Why Messrs. E. L. Blanchard and Karl Meyder wrote, composed, and published "The Jewel," a song for a mezzo-soprano, unless it were for the purpose of introducing the dedication and delicate frontispiece, we are at a loss to imagine.—Nos. 27 and 28 of "Popular and Celebrated Choruses for Ladies' Voices" are two sprightly and tuneful quartets by R. Schumann, "The Merry Hunter" and the "Watersprite," arranged for two soprani and two alti; they are admirably adapted for picnics, water-parties, or amateur concerts.—A "Petite Valse, pour Piano," by Henry Ketten, well deserves its title, for it is both tame and commonplace.—There is nothing to be said in praise of, though little to censure, in "Les Valses de Marguerite" (Landler Alsaciens) for the pianoforte, by J. B. Wekerlin.

SNORING

Is it not written in the "Pirkè Aboth" that a wife may be divorced for snoring, not, of course, occasional, but permanent and irremediable? Such a law is worthy of that grand Jewish nation which had to keep itself alive under unprecedented difficulties and against overwhelming odds by the strong energy of each individual exerted for the common weal; and how could a man have maintained this needful energy whose wife would snore away night after night? Snoring on the part of the bedfellow is somehow not a thing you get used to, as men are said to get used to the scream of railway whistles close to the thin walls of their semi-detached villas, or to the rush of water, or the click of mill-wheels. These things after a time become almost necessary to one's nightly comfort, so that (they say) one who has grown used to them feels restless when transferred to a bed-room into which no sound can penetrate. But snoring is to most men what the intermittent rattle of cabs is to the country cousin whose London quarters are on the direct line to some great terminus. Weary and excited with unaccustomed sights, somewhat "uncomfortable" through feeding at unusual hours, the poor fellow has just fallen into a fitful slumber, when "whirr-rush!" and, with a sensation like Victor Hugo's when he saw the Spirit of Greek Tragedy and that of the Apocalypse charge full tilt against each other with the shock as of two colliding railway trains, he wakes, lies simmering for half an hour, and then sinks off, only to be reawakened in a few minutes in the same cruel manner. Just such is the case of him who has a snoring wife, unless he is cased in the robur et æs triplex of that rare faculty of really heavy sleeping. Snoring (like the cabs) is intermittent; no one snores always, just as no one is wise and sensible at all hours. It is just intermittent enough to break the soothing spell of monotony. Besides, it does not begin from the beginning. Many a snoring wife, knowing her infirmity, lies awake, dear considerate creature, until her husband has "gone off" before she ventures herself to seek that repose which she feels will have so undesirable an accompaniment. Moreover, it is close to your ears, and you cannot get rid of it; there is absolutely no remedy. The loud ticking of a watch will for some men, and in certain states of nerves, cause sensations which seem like a foretaste of purgatory; but then you can wrap up your watch, and put it into a drawer, or, drawing it out of the watch-pocket, you can thrust it well under the pillow. Neither of these modes of riddance will answer in the case of a wife. A British jury, even of fellow-sufferers, would hardly hold you justified in subjecting her to the fate of Desdemona because of an outburst of snoring. How can you stop her? I still remember, with exultation, a farmhouse at Buttermere, where, years ago, the inn being full, several of us got beds after a very heavy day on the Fells. There was a fine old staircase branching away halfway up to right and left, and on either hand a fine old clock ticking as loud as a clock could tick. Sleep, rendered difficult by the tingling of the overheated blood, was made impossible by this rival ticking. However, I was equal to the occasion; stealthily, "with Tarquin's ravishing steps," I left my room, groped my way first to one wooden demon and then to the other, opened the clock-cases, grasped the pendulums, and in a moment all was still. But if you do summon up courage to grasp the sweet disturber of your rest by the bridge of the nose, you gain, perhaps, a few instant's respite; but remove your hand, and the nuisance begins, all the more aggravated by the short cessation.

Nor does night promise any respite. A cow that has lately lost her calf roaming and bellowing disconsolate on the hill-side two fields off is a melancholy night-watcher, and if you are disposed to be sleepless will effectually supplement your disposition. But then this nuisance may be readily abated; unless the farmer is your sworn foe and a very churl to boot, a polite note will make him put the offending animal into some other pasture before the second night begins. You can't get rid of a wife so easily. Besides, lowing cattle and twittering birds and such-like outside noise-makers are only grievous when you are wakefully inclined, and now you are just the reverse; you want sleep, and have prepared for it. You've had lots of gardening, no head-work to speak of, and a seven miles' drive under the stars, through the never-ending summer twilight. You feel that you could sleep even at Clapham Junction; but you cannot sleep through that strange nasal respiration, like the diapason of an organ, now rising high, now sinking into a low murmur as of a far-off wind. You gently wake your tormentor; and for a short while all is well. Would it could be always so; but she is sleepy, too; she relapses, and this time it is she who wakes you. And so on, and so on, until at last you can bear it no longer. You think you'll get up and write or read; but to settle to anything at that unusual hour needs more effort than you can make. So you steal away to a dressing-room, and strike a chill into your joints by creeping between cold sheets. It is hours before you "drop off;" but, at any rate, you are calm, you have escaped your tormentor. The worst of it is that just as you are well asleep, Susan and Eliza Jane begin their accustomed works; brooms rasp, pails tumble about as if of malice prepense, pots and pans begin their inarticulate noises, and you wake. Once more, however, tired Nature tries to get a good hold of her "sweet restorer," you fall into the deepest sleep of all, broken by no dream, so deliciously calm that it seems to last for weeks. Alas, it really lasted less than half an hour, and was rudely broken by a rush past the window which impressed on your sleeping senses the horrid feeling that your pigs have broken loose, and, followed by the cow, were tearing wildly into the garden. No; its only the two youngest bairns galloping bare-backed on "Dodo," up and down the lane under your dressing-room window. But sleep is now hopelessly gone; it's time to be stirring, and the sooner you are well awake the longer time you will have for deliberating whether or not, well-dosed with chloral, you shall venture next night into the arms of the snorer.

occupy a secondary place in public consideration during the trial of the Penge murder. Much of the time of the Court has been occupied in hearing the various depositions read. Stenning, one of the convict witnesses, stated on Wednesday that when he was leaving the Court on the last occasion Mr. Froggatt had whispered to him that he would send 2*l.* to the witness's wife because of the favourable evidence he had just given. Mr. Froggatt explained to the magistrate that on the occasion he was quite unaware of what he was doing, his mother having died a few days previously.—Further evidence in the case of the youths charged with highway robbery on Blackheath was taken last Saturday at the Greenwich Police Court, resulting in a further remand of the prisoners till yesterday (Friday). It was shown that the prisoners had attempted to change some of the stolen notes, and the coachman who drove Mr. Hodgson and two ladies from Woolwich in May last asserted that he believed Dinham to be the "highwayman" that stood by the horses while the other (Hyslop) took the money.—The prisoners charged with being concerned with others not in custody in stealing, between London and Paris, foreign bonds of the value of 70,000*l.* the property of Messrs. Raphael and Sons, were again to be brought before Sir R. Carden on Thursday.—The young man (Frederick John Chalkley) who stood charged with the recent burglary and violent assault of Mr. Alfred Braham, City Road, died at the House of Detention at Clerkenwell on Wednesday morning. He suffered from severe wounds in the head, and succumbed to erysipelas, which supervened.—The Countess of Hardwicke's residence at Hamble, near Netley Hospital, Southampton, was entered by robbers during a dinner party the other evening. The thieves locked the door from the inside and made their escape with much of her ladyship's jewellery and valuables. A jemmy was left by the burglars outside the window.—A zealous police-constable named Tierney, finding, a few days ago, that a prisoner he had captured in Hammersmith was about to escape, threw his lamp after him, "thinking," as the ingenuous officer admitted to the magistrate, "to knock him down." Foiled in his attempt to drag to custody the real offender, the officer seized a woman, whom be charged with aiding in the rescue. He seemed surprised that the magistrate not only objected to this Irish mode of arresting prisoners but discharged the woman on her recognisances.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. R. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. PARKER. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 29 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS.
Sold by all Stationers throughout the World

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed-for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

BRINLEY RICHARDS.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD-MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

The effect which "the Perfect Check Repeater Action," patented by Messrs. Brinsmead, produces on the touch, is everything that can be desired by an artist. It appears to me the most important invention of modern times, both for freedom of execution and expression.

I have equal pleasure in referring to Messrs. Brinsmead's New Metal-Back Pianofortes, which, as regards durability, richness, brilliancy, equality and contrast of tone, by far surpass Pianofortes of the ordinary construction at a much higher price.

I will not fail to draw the attention of Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian, of Schleswig-Holstein, to these inventions the next opportunity which may present itself.

CHARLES JOHN HERMAN EBERLEIN,
Conductor of the Philharmonic Society,
Capetown, Africa.

I have great pleasure in certifying to the fine, rich, and powerful tone of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianos, also to the great improvements they have succeeded in attaining.

As a Professor of the Harp, I can safely add that the mellow tones of their Short Iron Gold Medal Grands blend charmingly with the instrument I profess, and form a delicious ensemble.

The Manifesto of M. Thiers.——It is long since a public document has been received with so much favour in France as the paper in which M. Thiers expressed his last thoughts on the political situation. The various sections of the Republican party have united in ardent praise of its wisdom and decision. Judged from the standpoint of foreign criticism, it can hardly be considered perfectly satisfactory. In the first place, it seems far too long. We cannot suppose that a large number of workmen have had patience to go through so many columns; yet workmen are the very class whom Republicans should be most anxious to influence. In the second place, the Manifesto contains a good deal of that strange nonsense about the glory of France which gives Frenchmen so mysterious a pleasure. Neither of these things would, however, strike bourgeois electors as objections; and the general tone of the address is in exact accordance with their ways of thinking. M. Thiers expresses no enthusiasm for Republican institutions. On the contrary, he distinctly indicates that he would prefer a limited Monarchy; but he as distinctly shows that in the present position of France Monarchy is impossible. Nothing could be more ingenious or impressive than the manner in which he disposes of the claims of the Bonapartists. The Prince Imperial is alluded to with respect; but, it is added, his name so painfully reminds France of her humiliations that he cannot hope to rise to power. Not less skilful are the references to the Comte de Chambord and the Comte de Paris. France is thus insensibly led on to see that however objectionable the Republic may be, it is the only form of government that can be maintained. He also emphatically insists that there need be no fear of extravagance in the practical working of the Republic. The policy sketched out by M. Thiers is not an inspiriting one; his is not the sort of cause for which men become martyrs. And we are tolerably certain that the working classes will consider it too insignificant to be worthy of serious thought. It will, however, be a great step gained if the merchants and tradesmen can be won over; and there is no other way of influencing them except by perfect moderation. There can be little doubt that upon them the address has produced a profound impression: all the more profound in consequence of the inconceivably foolish Manifesto of Marshal MacMahon.

The Penge Murder.——Few persons, probably, will be inclined to call in question the decision at which the jury arrived in this most painful case. Although the process of murdering the unfortunate Harriet Staunton—a process protracted over many months—was entrusted to the hands of Patrick Staunton and his wife, yet it is plain that the deed was done at the instigation and for the benefit of Louis Staunton and his paramour. Modern sentiment shrinks from the hanging of women, and yet there is no valid reason why, if women commit deeds which are adjudged worthy of death, they should not undergo the extreme penalty of the law as well as the stronger sex. As regards the degrees of guilt respectively attributable to Patrick Staunton and his wife it is probable that the woman had the deeper share in the iniquity. Household management naturally falls to the mistress of the establishment, and the revolting process of doing the wretched prisoner to death inch by inch was in all probability the work of the wife rather than of the husband. As for Alice Rhodes, though undoubtedly she was morally and legally guilty of the murder, it is easy to appreciate the strong recommendation of the jury. As she had sacrificed her reputation for the sake of Louis Staunton, she was more completely under his control than even a wife would have been, and, though a consenting party, she was not one of those who executed the hideous process of slow starvation. Her degree of guilt, therefore, is somewhat less black than that of her accomplices. Lastly, we would venture to remark, as we have before remarked of similar cases, that these persons, though they have been convicted of a monstrous crime, were not necessarily monsters. Self-complacency is apt to assume that murderers are a special and exceptional variety of the human species. We prefer to accept the opinion expressed in the ancient proverb, "No one suddenly becomes altogether base." In all probability two years ago the four persons who have been sentenced to death at the Old Bailey bar would have shrunk with horror, like Hazael of old, from the contemplation of such an outrage. The hardening process was gradual. Marriage with an unattractive woman for the sake of her money was followed by an adulterous intercourse, and then arose a desire, which step by step overmastered all scruples, to get rid of the poor silly creature whose fortune had been, in her husband's eyes, her sole recommendation.

The Clyde Strike.——We are glad that there is a lull in the disastrous quarrel which has gone on for six months between the employers and workmen in the iron shipbuilding trade of Glasgow. The contending parties have agreed to submit their dispute to arbitration, and within a few weeks, it may be hoped, the men will be back at duty on terms which they will recognise as equitable. At the beginning of the conflict they desired that arbitrators should be appointed, but the masters would not hear of the arrangement. We cannot think that this refusal was prudent, for, although the demand for higher wages may have been deemed unjustifiable, the mere fact that it was made by a vast body of workers was proof that there was a case for the decision of an impartial judge. The consent of the employers to arbitration at this late date must also be held to indicate that they were wrong in declining it at an earlier period. The result of their action has been that much of the shipbuilding trade has been driven from the Clyde to the United States, just as it was driven some years ago from the Thames to the Clyde. It is all very well to blame the men, but they naturally desire to improve their position, and masters cannot expect to bring them to reasonable conditions except by a reasonable mode of dealing with them. They must have some evidence that their demands are fairly considered, and arbitration is the only evidence that can ever be quite satisfactory. We hope there will be no hesitation on the part of the men to accept the judgment, whatever it may be. We pointed out last week that on several occasions the employed have declined to accept the ruling of arbitrators, whereas employers have hitherto loyally acted upon the decision of the jointly-chosen authority. A great and beneficial effect would be produced among trades unions if in the present instance they were to see an example of absolute fairness and moderation.

Retired from Business.——When one of the partners in a firm retires from business he ought to retire for good and all. That proverbial tallow-refiner, who stipulated that he should be allowed to come down to the factory on melting-days, was probably rather a nuisance to his active coadjutors. But the retired partner who is perpetually coming down unasked to the scene of his former labours, and interfering with the business conducted there, must be a still more serious nuisance. Let us apply these facts to the conduct of our respected ex-Premier. Some time since he voluntarily relinquished the management of Her Majesty's Opposition, and professed his intention of retiring from politics. He probably at the moment meant what he said, but his subsequent behaviour has completely falsified the resolve he then made. Unlike most elderly men, he had underrated the youthfulness of his spirit. He found it impossible to retire, and, as a matter of fact, he has been more persistently before the public since his supposed withdrawal than ever before. In the House of Commons, should a debate of any special importance arise, he forthwith plunges into the fray, and, by his superior intellectual stature, eclipses the unfortunate colleague on whom his mantle of office has fallen. Outside the House, his activity is even still more remarkable; he is a copious contributor to magazines; he delivers addresses on all the subjects under the sun; he fells trees in the presence of multitudes of admiring excursionists, and he is ready to reply (by postcard) to any one who asks his advice or opinions, poor Sir Tollemache Sinclair excepted, who must have felt the return of his MSS. "with W. E. G.'s compliments," as an unusually severe blow, coming as it did from one who ordinarily indulges in such a flux of correspondence. If such a man as Lord Palmerston could have foreseen the manner in which his gifted junior would pass his later years, he would have said, "If this be retirement, let me die in harness." One result of Mr. Gladstone's ingenious method of keeping himself aloof from public affairs, is that he is perpetually getting into hot water, and rendering himself liable to be misrepresented. The latest instance of this is the Negropontis correspondence. Mr. Gladstone was charged with inciting the Greeks to make war on the Turks, and comic prints published injurious caricatures of him, in which he is depicted as a personage of villanous aspect in the act of handing a dagger to a Greek to plunge into the back of an unsuspecting Moslem. In this instance Mr. Gladstone seems to have disproved pretty effectually the literal charge which was made against him. But it would probably have been more prudent for a man of his eminence to bear in mind the case of Mr. Stansfeld and Mazzini, and to avoid writing to excitable foreigners on ticklish topics. Altogether we incline to believe that if Mr. Gladstone were to take the pledge for twelve months—against all public speaking and letter writing—he would decidedly enhance his reputation.

Modern Progress.——It is surely time that public speakers stopped talking of our incomparable progress during the last generation or two. We have all heard the story so often that it is impossible to be any longer interested in it, and the effect of its incessant repetition is not exactly healthful. Yet Mr. Bright thought he had nothing better to do on Tuesday in Rochdale than to go over the well-worn tale again. His audience was solemnly informed that we have gas nowadays, and railways, and newspapers; and it was invited to remark in how very superior a position these advantages placed us in comparison with our forefathers. It is, of course, right to be duly grateful for such things, but what ground is there for the assumption that they give us any kind of real superiority over those who have gone before us? Does the world produce better men now than it did hundreds or thousands of years ago? Have we greater artists, philosophers, and poets, than the ancient Greeks? In science alone we are ahead of them, but that does not justify us in complacently proclaiming ourselves higher than all our predecessors. Our boasts do not prove the superiority, they only prove the conceit, of the nineteenth century. If they did no more than this we might afford to smile at the laudations of their age by enthusiastic orators; but these extravagant estimates of our achievements do a vast amount of harm. They prevent us from studying our defects, and thus strike at the root of all true progress. In every great European society there are enormous evils, some of which appear to be growing worse rather than better. The rich are daily separated by a wider gulf from the poor, and moral improvement has not hitherto kept pace with the advance of education. Men like Mr. Bright would do much more good by dwelling upon this aspect of their epoch than they can ever hope to do by puffing us up with a sense of empty and silly vanity.

Our Food Supplies.——The perusal of Mr. Caird's able address at Aberdeen on the prospects of British agriculture affects the reader with some qualms of anxiety in spite of the optimism of its tone. Year by year, as population thickens, we are approximating more and more to the conditions of an island city like Venice, whose stores of food must all be brought within its gates from across the water. Year by year commons are enclosed, wastes are tilled, the average product of each acre of land is enhanced by improved methods of cultivation; but population increases so much faster than agricultural improvement that, but for extra supplies from abroad, we should be half-starved. Already the yearly bill sent in to John Bull by various foreigners and American or Colonial cousins for bread, beef, bacon, butter, and a dozen other necessaries of life, "foots up" to an enormous figure. Examine the nationality of the dishes on a well-furnished breakfast or dinner table. The bulk of them are of foreign origin. Beef on the sideboard from Holstein, bacon from Ohio, butter and eggs from Normandy, preserved salmon from Oregon, the loaf of bread compounded from wheatfields thousands of miles asunder—nothing British, except the milk, and that perhaps "Swiss Condensed." Our patriotic ancestors would have been shocked at the idea of being so dependent on foreigners for daily sustenance. Ought we to feel anxious? The energy of Trade is tremendous, and so long as we have cash or goods to exchange for food we need not, with so many interested people ready to feed us, fear famine. But suppose War should visit us, War, which binds the wings of Trade, as now in the Black Sea, where vast stores of South Russian wheat are barred out from the market. What then? All that can be said is that we must be prepared to fight to keep the seas open, and that maritime supremacy is even a greater necessity to us now than it was in Nelson's days.

Art in Private Houses.——An excellent paper was read in the Art Section of the Social Science Congress this week by Mr. John Forbes White, on the best way of introducing art into the houses of persons of small incomes. It is remarkable how much attention is now given to this matter in England. One does not need to be very old to remember a time when in the mass of middle-class families Art was the last subject to which any one would have thought of giving attention. With the usual British tendency to exaggeration, a good many people think it necessary at present to indulge in a great deal of foolish sentiment on the subject. We have little doubt, however, that genuine good will come of the movement, especially if those who really know Art come forward, and try to guide the popular taste. There is a very common impression that little can be done without the expenditure of a large amount of money; but this is no longer true. Of course, if a man will be content with nothing short of original paintings and statues, he must have a considerable fortune; but a house may be admirably decorated on less costly terms. Mr. White is very severe upon oleographs, which, of course, labour under the artistic stigma of pretending to be that which they are not. Still, they are effective as bits of colour, and colour in itself exercises a strong fascination on many persons.

Moreover, those who begin with oleographs will probably go on to better things, and drawings by the highest masters are now so fully reproduced by the autotype and other processes, and reproduced for so slight a sum, that every one who has a real love of Art may without difficulty supply himself with works of splendid quality. There is no reason why working-men should not adorn their walls with photographs which would be in place in the most artistic drawing-room. Many a labourer spends in one evening in a public-house as much as would procure for him an almost exact photographic copy of two or three sketches by Raphael or Leonardo. And a very moderate amount of saving would suffice for the purpose of a truly admirable plaster cast of the Apollo Belvidere. Is it too much to hope that it will occur even to workmen by and by to take some slight advantage of these magnificent opportunities?

DETECTIVES.——Whether the officers who have lately been examined at Bow Street are innocent or guilty of the charges alleged against them it is not our business to determine, but at the same time we may remark that men of their profession are exposed to peculiar trials and temptations. They have to mix familiarly with scoundrels, they are expected to possess a combination of qualities which are by no means common,—patience, courage, activity, caution, and readiness, together with a histrionic aptitude for disguise, and at the same time their official pay amounts to a very modest figure. Add to this that, when detectives are employed where valuable property is missing, they are well aware that in nine cases out of ten the losers would far sooner get back their property, or part of their property, than capture the thief. It is all very fine, the victims say, to talk of one's duty to society, but the prosecution of a criminal is both a worrying and a costly proceeding. So the detectives get a broad hint. "We don't want the man, if you can recover the bulk of the booty," and as their pecuniary interest points in the same direction, they are not unnaturally inclined to act in accordance with these instructions. Major Ross's proposal that the detective department shall be open to the whole police force after six years' service, and shall be perpetually recruited with fresh blood by a system of rapid draughting into a reserve, is worthy of consideration, as coming from a practical man, though it seems to us that most of the detectives under the new system will be men of rather brief experience, and that this will be a disadvantage in a profession where great skill can only be acquired by many years of practice.

NOTICE.——The publication of VICTOR HUGO'S forthcoming work, "THE STORY OF A CRIME," will be commenced in this journal early in October, and continued weekly until completed. It will be illustrated by eminent artists. This long-expected work is looked for with the greatest interest in France, especially at the existing political crisis, as it contains M. Hugo's impressions, derived from his own observations as an eye-witness, of the Napoleonic Coup d'État of December, 1851.

THE WAR.

THE GRAPHIC.

So large a number of interesting Illustrations relating to the War, more particularly of the BATTLES now raging at PLEVNA and the SHIPKA PASS, are daily arriving from our Artists with the Russians and the Turks, that it is found impossible to afford space for them in the Ordinary Numbers of THE GRAPHIC.

It has been determined, therefore, to issue these Sketches in the form of a GRAND EXTRA DOUBLE NUMBER, consisting of three whole sheets, a Bird's-eye View of the Seat of War, printed in three colours, showing the Russian and Turkish positions, and the parts of Bulgaria occupied by the Russians and now retaken by the Turks, and an illustrated cover. The letterpress has been especially written for this Number, and will comprise a full and succinct account of the great battles which have recently taken place.

THIS NUMBER IS NOW READY, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

BEFORE PLEVNA—IN THE GRAVITZA REDOUBT

IN the Extra War Number of The Graphic, which has been published this week, the fighting before Plevna and the taking of the Gravitza Redoubt by the Roumanians are so fully described that we need not repeat any detailed account of the operations here. Our front-page picture depicts the visit of Colonel Wellesley, the British Military Attaché, the correspondent of the Scotsman, and our own artist to the Gravitza Redoubt after its capture—a feat which they accomplished by running the gauntlet of a heavy Turkish fire from an adjoining redoubt. A space of some 600 yards of open ground had to be traversed between the cover of a hill and the entrance of the redoubt, which our artist safely reached after running at full speed through what he truly calls a "shower of lead." The interior of the redoubt, with its terrible heaps of wounded and dying men lying helpless, unattended, and wholly destitute of any medical aid, has been described as most heartrending, the explanation of the neglect given to Colonel Wellesley by a Roumanian officer being that the doctors were obliged to take cases in the order of their occurrence, and as the Roumanians had suffered not a little two days before, the doctors had still not been released from those early cases. It has been remarked how rarely a correspondent is wounded in his duties, so that we may mention that the correspondent of the Scotsman, in retiring from the redoubt, was hit by a bullet on his ancle; the wound, however, was not serious.

BEFORE PLEVNA—THE FIRST THREE DAYS' FIGHTING

THESE two sketches form an interesting supplement to those published in our War Number, inasmuch as they portray the positions above Radisovo, whence when the fog lifted the best view of the operations could be obtained. On the left of the first lies Plevna, and on the right the long-suffering village of Radisovo; while on the hills beyond may be seen the Russians in possession of the first ridge vigorously bombarding with their field artillery their opponents on the two further ridges. The village of Radisovo was Shackovskoi's old position which he held as forepost line on that July 30th, the eve of that fatal day when the Russians were definitively repulsed from their first attack on Plevna. The second sketch depicts General Krudener's position on the north-east of Plevna. On the left are the Turkish forces attempting an attack upon Skobeleff from their redoubts in the bend of the Sofia Road; the "Giant Battery" represents the largest Russian siege battery before Plevna.

THE CZAR AND SOME OF HIS GENERALS

THIS group, photographed by M. Duschek of Bucharest at Gorny Studen, the headquarters of the Russian Army, represents the Czar and some of his chief generals. First, there is Prince Charles of Roumania, who though, strictly speaking, hardly a Russian general, has gained considerable renown by the undoubted valour his little army has recently shown before Plevna. Next we have the Grand Duke Nicholas, the Czar's brother, and Commander-in-Chief of the Russian forces. Veteran General Suvaroff is also there, and the two young officers, Grand Dukes Sergius and Nicholas the younger, who just now are early learning the art of warfare after a very practical fashion.

THE CZAREVITCH AND HIS STAFF

HERE we have the Czarevitch and his staff on the field with the army of the Lom, of which the Czarevitch is the commander. As yet he can hardly be said to have achieved any decided success, for though at first it seemed as though he would rapidly succeed in his eastward advance, and by effecting a junction with General Gourko easily become master of Eastern Bulgaria, he subsequently met with such determined resistance from Mehemet Ali and his army that he has been compelled not only to yield up the ground he had secured, but to retire from the Lom upon the Jantra, making Biela his headquarters.

THE YACHT "CONSTANCE"—HELP FOR THE REFUGEES

THIS little vessel, a schooner yacht of some 225 tons, has been generously placed by its owner, Mr. Lovett, at the disposal of the promoters of the Turkish Compassionate Fund, which, thanks to the Baroness Burdett Coutts, and to the exertions of the Daily Telegraph, has reached a considerable figure. Its chief purpose is to afford aid to the thousands of homeless refugees whose sufferings, already great, will be terrible unless relieved before the cold and wet weather of the winter sets in. "The yacht," says the Daily Telegraph, "is now ready to receive and stow any charitable contributions of clothing, stores, and medical comforts which may be forwarded for the suffering Turkish refugees." The vessel is lying in the Southampton River, waiting orders for sailing. She carries a crew of fifteen all told, and is rather a smart-looking craft, schooner rigged, and with masts not very taut. Her dimensions are: length between perpendiculars 103 feet, and the beam amidships measures 23 feet 4 inches. The Constance is not a new vessel, being built some years ago by Mr. White, of Cowes. Lately many alterations have been made, and altogether she is what a sailor would call a "snug and roomy vessel." She will proceed on her voyage to Constantinople as soon as she is freighted with the articles destined for distribution.

Pending the appointment of agencies in London and Southampton for the reception of stores, they must be sent (carriage paid), addressed: "Yacht Constance, Turkish Compassionate Fund, Southampton." The directors of the Great Eastern Railway Company have kindly consented to carry parcels and goods for the yacht Constance from the South-Western stations, addressed as before mentioned, "Turkish Compassionate Fund," to Philip Hedger, Esq., Dock House, Southampton, by favour of the Great Eastern Railway Company.

With regard to the articles which are most to be desired for the refugees, the following telegram has been received by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts from Mr. Layard:

"I have taken best advice as to articles to be sent out in the yacht. They should be common cotton stuffs for dress; common sheeting calico for clothing: coloured flannels, thick woollen stockings and socks; with quinine, which last may be usefully given in any quantities. There is very great distress amongst Christian as well as Mussulman refugees. Made-up clothing, preserved meats, milk, and such things, are of no service."

It will interest contributors to the Fund to know that their gifts are producing the greatest benefit, and averting wide-spread distress. The condition of the women and children around Adrianople was reported to Mr. Layard as "desperate," when the first sixty-five loads of flour and provisions came, as if from Heaven, to the rescue.

The Committee at Constantinople, under the direction of Mrs. Layard, are engaged alike in relieving immediate sickness and starvation, and in the more important work of providing for the sufferings which must inevitably attend the approach of cold weather. In a short time 2,000 dresses will be ready for distribution. Charcoal in considerable quantities has been purchased and stored. Sheets and all necessaries in the way of linen have been provided to the hospital at Adrianople, and others, as well as to the hospital for fugitive women and children, which is opened this week at Constantinople at the cost of 30*l.* a month. A few days ago Mrs. Layard visited the fugitives, who have been placed in a large building belonging to the Sultan at Bey-ler-Bey, on the Bosphorus. They had only bare walls, with old matting to lie upon, and many of the women and children were almost without clothing. Rice, coffee, and clothing were distributed to the most needy. Some

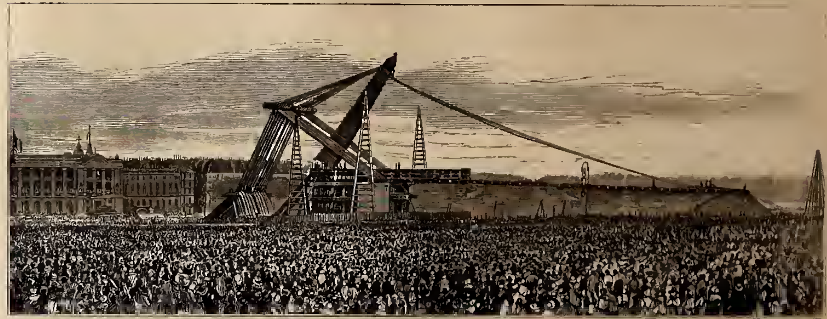
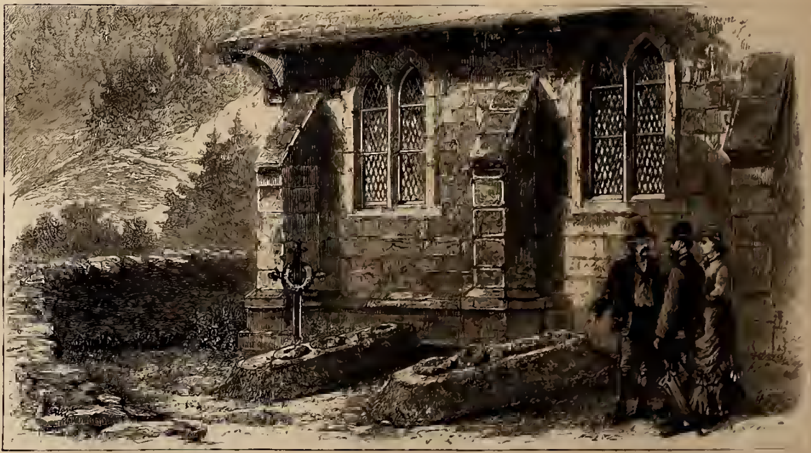
THE COLLISION IN THE CHANNEL—ATTEMPTING TO BLOW UP THE HULL OF THE "FOREST," OFF WEYMOUTH



CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE—RAISING THE OBELISK OF LUXOR IN THE PLACE DE LA CONCORDE, PARIS, OCTOBER 25, 1836



THE RECENT ALPINE ACCIDENT—THE ENGLISH CHURCH, ZERMATT, WITH THE GRAVES OF MESSRS. HAYMAN, LEWIS, AND PATERSON charitable Turkish ladies were doing their best to help these poor creatures, of whom there were about three hundred women and children.

THE COLLISION IN THE CHANNEL

THE hull of the Forest, which has caused so much danger to the navigation of the Channel since the fearful accident of the 11th inst., has at length been towed off the sandbank upon which she lay, and safely moored inside the breakwater at Portland. The attempts which were last week made to blow up the wreck were complete failures. On Tuesday, the 18th inst., H.M.S. Defence, and a number of steam-launches belonging to the Warrior, Black Prince, and Thunderer, went to the hulk, which then lay keel upwards about five miles E.N.E. of the Shambles Light Ship, a position to which she had drifted from the spot where she was first seen after the accident. A shell fired from the Defence struck the hulk, but made only a small hole in it, and then the blue-jackets climbed upon her, and with hatchets endeavoured to cut their way through; the object being to get a charge of powder inside the vessel. The work, however, proved too difficult, and the explosion of 300 lb. of gunpowder at the side of the vessel had little effect beyond raising a splendid cascade of water. Next day another fruitless attempt was made, and on Saturday last H.M.S. Defence and the Trinity steamer Galatea towed a portion of the hulk into deep water, and afterwards to Portland. As late as Wednesday last, however, there was a large quantity of wreckage floating about, supposed to be part of the Forest. A passenger by the Channel Islands mail steamer Cygnus says that on that day a very large mass was found about five miles S.E. from Guernsey; and between Guernsey and Weymouth hundreds of pieces of rail and plank were observed, one large piece, which might have been a boat, being met with sixteen miles north of the Caskets. This wreckage was all drifting southwards, and is very dangerous to navigation. The inquest on the bodies which drifted ashore at Weymouth has ended in an open verdict, the evidence being insufficient to fix the blame on the officers of either vessel. The jury attached a rider expressing indignation at the manner in which the funeral had been conducted.

RAISING THE LUXOR OBELISK AT PARIS

THIS incident, which occurred on Oct. 25th, 1836, is especially interesting just now, when, if it reaches our shores safely, we are about to erect the sister obelisk in London. The engraving from which our picture is copied was kindly lent to us by Mr. Hodgson Pratt, of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, 150, Strand, and the following account is abridged from his personal reminiscences. Crowds assembled to witness the scene in the Place de la Concorde, the shops were shut, and the day was observed as a general holiday. The King (Louis Philippe) watched the gradual rise of the monolith from the windows of the Admiralty on the north side of the great square, and of course gave the Cross of the Legion of Honour to the engineer when the feat was successfully accomplished. The obelisk was landed in its wooden case at a quay of the river Seine, and was then dragged along the ground, base forwards, until it reached the lower end of a very long wall, which sloped from the ground upwards, until it reached the height of and touched one of the four edges of the granite pedestal which was waiting to receive it. The obelisk, having been hauled up this sloping wall, was ready to be placed in a perpendicular position. To effect this object blocks of masonry had been erected on either side of the pedestal, and on these were erected six immense masts of timber, furnished with blocks and pulleys. Through one set of pulleys ran ropes attached to the apex of the obelisk; through the other set, ropes attached to a large number of powerful windlasses, placed in front of the pedestal. As soon as the three hundred men employed to turn these began to work, the masts, which had stood at an angle of twenty-five degrees, and sloped towards the obelisk, began to rise to a perpendicular position. As they did so, the obelisk began to quit its recumbent attitude on the wall, and to rise. The masts continued to move upward, and after occupying a perpendicular position, they descended to a horizontal one, their tops having described a semicircle in the air. The Obelisk of Luxor, now stood erect, to the great joy of the spectators. Mr. Pratt agrees with us in advising that our sister "Needle" should be placed—not on Palace Green, cheek by jowl with statues of Canning, Derby, Palmerston, and Peel, who will look like policemen in attendance on the Sphinx—but in front of the British Museum in Bloomsbury. If engineering difficulties should prevent the carriage so far inland, suitable sites may be found either on the Thames Embankment or in Battersea Park.

GRAVES OF ALPINE CLIMBERS AT ZERMATT

WE have already given an account of the fatal accident which took place on the Lyskamm (Zermatt) on the 6th inst. At 2 A.M. on that day two English barristers, Messrs. W. A. Lewis and W. H. Paterson, left the Riffel Hotel with three guides, brothers, named Knubel. As they did not return in the evening, a search-party was sent out, and it was found that, owing to the giving way of a cornice of snow, they had been precipitated a distance of 3,000 or 4,000 feet. Death was probably instantaneous. The bodies were afterwards recovered, and those of the two Englishmen were buried in the graveyard of the English church at Zermatt, next to the grave of Mr. Hayman, who, it will be remembered, fell into a crevasse last September. The funeral, which took place on Monday, the 10th inst., was attended by all the English, and by a large number of the inhabitants. The service was choral. The graves are on the south side of the church. That of Mr. Hayman has a cross over it. Mr. Lewis is buried next to him, and then Mr. Paterson. The funeral of the three guides took place on the following day at St. Niklaus. They all left widows and families, for the benefit of whom a subscription has been got up among the visitors.—We are indebted for our sketch and for the above details to Mr. John Lanyon, F.R.I.B.A., of Belfast, Ireland.

THE NUBIAN CARAVAN

THIS novel exhibition, which is now to be seen at the Alexandra Palace, includes a large menagerie of rare animals from the north of Africa. There are three rhinoceroses, five elephants, eight buffaloes, the same number of giraffes, several ostriches, and twenty-one racing dromedaries, besides goats, hunting dogs, and other animals. But the chief attraction is of course the troupe of native hunters by whom all these animals were actually caught, and who now have charge of them. There are fourteen Nubians, representatives of five different tribes, and one negro, a young man who has been rescued from slavery. He belongs to the tribe of Baza which, inhabiting a district midway between the Abyssinians, who are Christians, and the Nubians and Arabs, who are Mohammedans, is badly treated by each, its women and children being often seized and sold into slavery. The negro belonging to the troupe is regarded by the other members with the most profound contempt, as they look upon him as a pariah. The whole caravan is under the leadership of Josef Mengos, a Maltese, who has for some years resided in Upper Egypt, being employed by Mr. Hagenbeck, an importer of wild zoological specimens, of Hamburg, to lead the Nubians on their hunting expeditions. A short time ago the "happy thought" occurred to Mr. Hagenbeck that it would make a very interesting exhibition if the Nubians themselves could be induced to come over with the animals they had captured. Negotiations were entered into, and the result is the visit to Europe of this troupe, which first in Paris, afterwards in Hamburg, and now at the Alexandra Palace, have created such a great sensation. The skins of the majority of the troupe are coffee-coloured, but two of them have the black complexion, woolly hair, and protuberant features of the negro race. The faces of the others are well-shaped, but the wide opening lips, disclosing rows of splendidly white teeth, give them a grinning expression which is very peculiar. They are powerful, muscular men. They wear white trousers and a white cloth, which, in hot weather, they fasten round them so that they are naked to the waist. The Nubians, with their animals, are established in a great enclosure in the Palace grounds, round which they ride on the camels and buffaloes, some riding the "ship of the desert" without any saddle, and sticking on to the animal at full gallop. They also go through their war-dances, and their performance concludes with an exact representation of the progress of a caravan through the desert, filling their bags with water, and loading the camels with the boxes in which they convey the wild animals they may have caught.

"CELIA'S ARBOUR"

"AMY ROBSART"

THE quotation from Aubrey's "History of Berkshire," placed underneath Mr. Yeames's picture, sufficiently explains its subject, besides which, the tragical story of Amy Robsart is known to most readers either from the perusal of our historical annals, or from the fascinating pages of Scott's romance of "Kenilworth," or from the well-known ballad entitled "Cumnor Hall." We need, therefore, only add here that Queen Elizabeth had a great dislike to having married people about her. No one at her Court ever entered into wedlock without incurring her serious displeasure, and Lord Robert Dudley only escaped the odium which Her Majesty cast upon connubial existence because as a courtier he was practically a bachelor, for his wife, Amy Robsart, never appeared at Court, but stayed at home and busied herself with the cares of country life. Her death, as Aubrey observes in his narrative, was represented as being accidental, and Queen Elizabeth, with whom Dudley was at that time a prime favourite, warmly adopted this view; but popular opinion, as well as that of the majority of the courtiers, agreed with Cecil in regarding her husband as "infamed by her death."

GOING TO A PICNIC IN RUSSIA

SUCH a scene as is here delineated is precisely described in an article entitled "A Russian Picnic," which appeared in our issue of April 14th Inst, No. 385. We quote two or three sentences from the opening paragraph:—"A brilliant night, with myriads of stars in the heavens, a moon nearly at her full, and a thermometer showing 17 deg. below zero. Such was the night of our picnic. We were in the month of January, much snow had fallen, and consequently the trainage was good, so we had no fear of the forty versts that we had to get over, notwithstanding we were going in those unwieldy, clumsy, three-horse sledges called troika."

"H.M.S. TÉMÉRAIRE"

THE sketches of this vessel, which appear on page 309, are doubly interesting on account of the novel principle upon which her armament is worked, a characteristic which distinguishes her from any other of our ironclads. The Téméraire was commissioned at Chatham on the 1st August by Captain M. Culme-Seymour, with a complement of 530, officers and men. Although her length is only 280 ft. she has no less than 62 ft. of beam; her armour-plating abreast of the battery is 11 in. of iron, and the ship is armour-plated round the water-line with armour of 11 in. thick amidships, which extends 5 ft. below the water-line and tapers off to 4 in. round the bow and stern; a few feet below the bows a powerful spur or ram is fitted, which projects 8 ft. beyond the bow. The Téméraire is brig rigged, and the height of her masts from the water-line is no less than 180 ft. The vessel is a magnificent specimen of engineering skill, and a most costly experiment. The spars are of the heaviest description, the main yard measuring 150 ft., and as in the Inflexible the top hamper would be disposed of overboard on going into action. Unlike other ships, the Téméraire is very high between decks and well ventilated. Her engines, made by Messrs. Humphrys, Tennant and Co., are of 7,000 horse-power. The speed gained, with everything on board and the ship drawing 26 ft. of water, is 14½ knots an hour. She carries 650 tons of coal. Her armament consists of four 25-ton guns and four 18-ton guns, and she is fitted with ports for firing the Whitehead torpedoes. She also carries Harvey's torpedoes and outrigger torpedoes, and each man on board is supplied with a rifle, revolver, or cutlass. Two of the 25-ton guns are mounted, one at each end of the ship, in barbette towers (one of the subjects of our illustrations), and are worked entirely by hydraulic machinery supplied by Sir W. Armstrong's firm, the principle upon which they are worked being Mr. Rendel's. These guns are protected by 10 in. of iron round the tower at the side, but have no protection whatever when in the firing position. The gun when in the loading position is entirely out of sight, and rests upon chocks; the powder and projectile are raised to the muzzle from the magazine and lower deck by means of a hydraulic lift, and then rammed home by hydraulic machinery. The gun continues out of sight while being "laid," and can be raised and fired in a few seconds. Both guns revolve upon turn-tables, and the foremost gun can be fired right ahead and the after gun right astern. Only five men are required in the barbette tower for loading, elevating, and firing the gun. Eighteen rounds were fired last week with battering charge (85 lb. of powder and a 530 lb. shot), in the presence of the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith), and the machinery connected with the guns worked admirably. The recoil caused by the firing replaces the gun out of sight, and, the turn-table being set in motion immediately, the gun is at once revolved into the loading position.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——There has been little movement in political circles beyond the inevitable speech-making of M.P.'s who do not care to let their tongues grow rusty during the recess. The chief item of interest is perhaps that of Mr. Gladstone's letter to the editor of the Daily Telegraph (sent also to the other daily papers), respecting his correspondence with M. Negropontis, which we have commented upon in another column.—Mr. Gladstone was to be present at the laying of the foundation-stone of the new University College at Nottingham on Thursday, and in the evening was to speak on the Eastern Question at the Skating Ring—a building capable of holding 10,000 people.—Birmingham has started a subscription to pay the fine of 2,000*l.* imposed on M. Gambetta, as an expression of "the feelings entertained by English Liberals in reference to the unjust prosecution against him." At first it was proposed to limit the subscriptions to one franc, but many larger sums have already been sent in.—Sir Stafford Northcote struck a hard blow at the Obstructives in his address to the members of the Exeter Literary Society last week. After reviewing the progress of science, art, and literature, he expressed a doubt whether strength of character was developed equally with mental culture, and said that vanity and conceit, the most mischievous intellectual disease of the day, was at the bottom of a large proportion of waste time in Parliament, and was often most damaging to the cause which the persons who insisted on unnecessary speaking imagined they were advancing.—Mr. Parnell paid a visit to his constituents at Navan on Monday, and was received with high honour. The houses were decorated with evergreens, the Town Commissioners presented an address, and the hon. member was met at the railway station by a body of priests and the band of the "Bakers of Meath," which played "God save Ireland." There was a triumphal procession through the streets, after which Mr. Parnell delivered a lecture on "The Parliament of Ireland, Past, Present, and Future," in the course of which he said that he was not much concerned about the maintenance of the institution called the House of Commons. They had not got much good from it in times past; in fact, they had got more kicks than halfpence. The Irish people did not regard it with very friendly feelings either, and it must be seen sooner or later that the Government could not possibly attempt in the face of a determined Irish Opposition to make laws for themselves unless they first gave the Irish people the right to make laws for themselves.—On Wednesday Messrs. Biggar and Parnell spoke at a meeting of the Belfast Home Rule Association, and resolutions were subsequently passed approving of their policy.—The Standard says that a meeting called together at Hamilton, N.B., on Wednesday last by Mr. O'Connor Power was interrupted by the advent of some 500 Nationalists, who in spite of locked doors and guardian policemen took forcible possession of the place. Mr. O'Connor Power and his friends fled from the platform, which was taken possession of by the invaders, who passed a resolution declaring that Mr. O'Connor Power was unworthy of confidence and a traitor to the cause of Irish nationality. The Nationalists then sung "God save Ireland," and went home to Glasgow doubtless highly pleased with their victory.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS opened at Aberdeen on Wednesday week. The inaugural address was given by the President, the Earl of Aberdeen, who spoke feelingly of the temptations to which the bulk of the people were exposed, and hopefully of the efforts which are being made for their welfare. The long list of subjects discussed on the following days included The Science of Law (Lord Gifford, Judge of the Supreme Court of Scotland), Health (Dr. Hardwicke, the Middlesex Coroner), Education (Lord Young, another Scottish Judge), Portrait Painting in Scotland (Lord Ronald Gower), Prevention and Punishment of Crime (the Lord Advocate), Progress of Sanitary Science (Mr. Edwin Chadwick), Our Food Supply and the Land Laws (Mr. J. Caird), and Extension of Suffrage for Women (Miss Lydia Becker), besides many others in the Sectional meetings. On Thursday last week some 200 members of the Conference dined with the Lord Provost and Corporation of the City; on Friday a conversazione was held in the Town Hall; on Saturday excursions were made to Balmoral and other places of interest; on Monday several members of the Congress addressed a meeting of working men, held in the Music Hall under the presidency of the Lord Provost; and on Wednesday the Congress came to an end with the address of Mr. Hastings, the President of the Council, who gave an account of the work of the past year, saying that special attention had been devoted to the working of the Poor Laws, and urging the desirableness of lessening out-door relief, as tending to reduce pauperism.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Mansion House Indian Famine Fund on Wednesday amounted to more than 250,000*l.* Lord Beaconsfield, replying to the Mayor of Penzance, says that the Government are anxiously considering the question of a grant from the Imperial Exchequer.—The Aldermen of the City of London have again refused to admit Sir J. Bennett, although returned at the second election by a majority of two to one. They have ordered another election, and Sir John has expressed his intention of again going to the poll.—General Grant continues to be received with enthusiasm wherever he goes. On Saturday he was at Newcastle, where there was a demonstration on the Town Moor of the trade and other societies of Northumberland and Durham, the two Miners' Associations forming the largest bodies present. Mr. T. Burt, M.P., presented an address, and the General briefly replied. General Fairchild, the representative of the United States at Liverpool, also spoke. In the evening a banquet was given by the Mayor and Corporation. On Monday General Grant arrived at Sunderland, and was welcomed by a large concourse of people. Thousands of members of trade and friendly societies walked in procession with banners. The Mayor laid the foundation stone of a free library and museum, and General Grant was presented with an address of welcome from the Corporation, and with another address from trade and friendly societies.—On Wednesday the General reached Sheffield, and was received at the station by the Mayor and Corporation. A procession was afterwards formed to the Cutlers' Hall, where addresses where presented by the Cutlers' Company, and the Chamber of Commerce.—The Trades' Union Congress at Leicester came to a close on Tuesday, one of the notable features being the attendance of Mr. Brassey.—The London Masons' strike still continues. At the beginning of the week a number of foreign workmen began work upon the new Law Courts, and more were daily expected to arrive, but the place was strongly picketed, and though no breach of the law was attempted, the men on strike have managed to checkmate the masters by persuading the foreigners to leave the job. On Wednesday they had all gone off by the Hamburg steamer. It is said that one effect of the strike will be that for some time the use of stone in London buildings will be abandoned, concrete being adopted as a substitute.—The Clyde strike, after lasting six months, and causing loss of wages and profits of about half a million, has ended in an agreement to submit to arbitration, the men resuming work on the old terms in the interim.—There is a strike amongst some of the employés on the Great Southern and Western Railway of Ireland, and the passenger traffic is much impeded.

THEATRES

Drury Lane theatre has reopened for the season, and spectacular drama once more fills the vast space of its famous stage. The death of Mr. Halliday, whose talents in the way of dramatising novels were so often called into requisition by Mr. Chatterton on these occasions, has, however, necessitated the services of another dramatist, and this time Mr. W. G. Wills has set himself to the task of preparing a dramatic version of one of the stories of Sir Walter Scott. "Peveril of the Peak," the novel selected for the occasion, does not present many advantages from the point of view of the dramatic adaptor, and hence there is little room for surprise that Mr. Wills should have chosen, as he himself explains, to depend on his own inventive faculties, insomuch that only two dramatic situations in the piece are traceable to the novel. The only legitimate ground for surprise is that a piece so nearly original should endanger its claims to praise on that score by adopting even the names of the personages of the novel; but there is a fashion in these things, and Mr. Chatterton is understood to have hitherto got on so well with his Waverley adaptations that he might be excused for a superstitious regard for associations of this kind. It is observable, however, that the title of the play is not "Peveril of the Peak," but England in the Days of Charles II. After all, audiences perhaps care little for these questions; nor is the public much concerned with any question but that of the dramatic qualities of the piece. From this point of view Mr. Will's play is unfortunately not quite satisfactory. There is stir and movement throughout its scenes; and there is a pair of lovers much distracted between private affections and complicity in State affairs, and there are a great many effective tableaux, in which brilliantly-dressed persons crowd the stage in a picturesque way. But the story comes out indistinctly, and a want is felt of a continuous thread of interest. These defects, however, are almost invariably found in spectacular dramas, and Mr. Wills has, in all probability, been cramped in the exercise of his invention by the paramount importance attracted to spectacle and elaborate set scenes. The rocky coast scene, and the "View of Birdcage Walk in the days of King Charles II.," are fine examples of scenic art. The acting under these conditions requires no comment. On the whole Mr. Wills' play fulfils its purpose, and we are bound to add that the combined efforts of the author and the management appear to give much satisfaction to the audience.

The transcendental tendencies of Liverpool dramatic criticism, particularly when directed to the acting of Mr. Irving, has lately attracted some attention. Since we quoted the other day some curious examples from a leading Liverpool paper, a new Liverpool critic has appeared in the person of Mr. Hall Caine, who has published a "Dramatic Study," devoted to Mr. Irving's view of the characters of Macbeth and Richard III., and dedicated "with all admiration" to Mr. Edward Russell, of the Liverpool Daily Post. "By Mr. Irving," we are here told, "the germ of characterisation is grasped at the onset, and the vitality throughout is radiated from that inner circle." Again: "Consciously or intuitively Mr. Irving first realises the earthwork of a dramatic creation, and then goes on rearing each feature upon the last, or evolving each emotion from the emotion which precedes it, until the denouement of the characterisation has become heightened or modified into a relationship with its proem that is determined by the influence of just those circumstances which, as being powerful in the formation of character, made it worthy of the poet to produce the play." In spite of all this enthusiasm, Mr. Caine's principal object is to take exception to this actor's, or rather this "histrion's craven view of Macbeth," and to his failure to perceive that Macbeth "mistakes the agonies of remorse for the promptings of fear." This distinction, Mr. Caine thinks, is one of which we must "assure ourselves" with "great care," for he elegantly adds, "without we do we will experience some perplexity." If we have gathered any notion of his meaning, Mr. Caine objects to the actor's impersonation of Richard on somewhat similar grounds; but this will perhaps suffice as a specimen of his pamphlet. Since its appearance, however, yet another Liverpool Shakespearian critic has arisen, who, referring to Mr. Caine's publication, says:—"A mass of intellectual material, gathered here and there, under the direction of a fine critical instinct, has been placed in the crucible and subjected to the slow fire of patient, honest thought; and the various elements, fused down and homologated, unite to form a new critical creation, bearing no marks of the erudity and disconnectedness which at first sight seem inevitable." It will be observed that while the Liverpool critics warmly appreciate each other, they give some evidence of their sincerity by cultivating a style which has many points in common.

The new musical extravaganza, produced at the Alhambra under the title of King Indigo, is not wanting in the ingenious pleasantries for which Mr. Burnand, the adaptor of the piece, is famous. Moreover, the music of Johann Strauss, which has contributed so much to the popularity of La Reine Indigo on the Continent, is light and graceful, albeit of an unambitious character. Yet the piece failed to give satisfaction to the audience. In vain Madame Dolaro sang and acted in her finished style; in vain Mr. Paulton laboured to amuse the spectators in the character of the King, who, as the inheritor of the treasures of the "Forty Thieves," is called upon to protect his valuables from the descendants of Ali Baba; and Mr. Loredan, Miss Newton, and Miss Chambers were hardly more successful. The truth is, that at the Alhambra picturesque scenery, magnificent costumes, and gay decorations are regarded as of so much importance that they are apt to be allowed to overpower the story of the dialogue. When a theme is lightly treated, this is an objection not much felt; but King Indigo is, if anything, a substantial opera bouffe, and as such it is decidedly overloaded. The ballet in the last act, however, is a redeeming feature. Its music is pretty, its dances graceful, and the whole constitutes an effective spectacle.

The right to translate and adapt for the English stage M. Sardou's Dora is understood to have been acquired by the management of the Prince of Wales' Theatre. The production of the English version is, however, postponed. This evening Mrs. Bancroft and her company will reappear, after some weeks' absence, in Mr. Tom Taylor's comedies, To Parents and Guardians and An Unequal Match. Miss Litton has joined the Prince of Wales' troupe, together with Miss Kate Phillips.

The Court Theatre will reopen for the season on Saturday next, when the late Lord Lytton's posthumous comedy, entitled The House of Darnley, will be performed for the first time. The play, which was left by the author unfinished, has been completed, at the request of the present Lord Lytton, by Mr. Charles Coghlan, who has added a fifth act.

The Royalty Theatre will reopen early in October under the management of Miss Kate Santley. An English version of Lecocq's La Marjolaine is in preparation.

Mr. Hollingshead is about to produce at the Gaiety Theatre a new burlesque by Mr. Byron, a new farcical piece by Mr. Burnand, a new operetta by Mr. Layton, and a new play of MM. Meilhac and Halévy.

This evening the Strand Theatre will reopen for the season with a new comedy by Mr. Burnand, entitled Family Ties, and a new burlesque by Messrs. Reece and Farnie.

The annual benefit of Messrs. Samuel and Alfred Crauford will take place at the Britannia on Wednesday, October 3, on which occasion Mr. George Conquest will appear in the farce The Waiter at the Eagle. A new romantic drama by Mr. R. Dodson, called Deoch an' Durass, will follow, in which Mrs. S. Lane will appear, as well as other entertainments.

Ripon House.——Some members of Mr. Charles Sleigh's School of Dramatic Art gave representations on Saturday and Monday last of Mr. H. T. Craven's well-known serio-comic drama, Milky White. The part of the deaf dairyman, undertaken at short notice by Mr. Sleigh himself, was well rendered; and the manner in which the other characters were supported was evidence of the great value of the artistic training afforded by the School. Miss F. Ashford was the Mrs. Saddrip, and Miss K. Ray the daughter of White; while Miss Eva Curzon made a very effective Dick Dugs, it being the first time (so says the programme) that that character has ever been attempted by a lady.

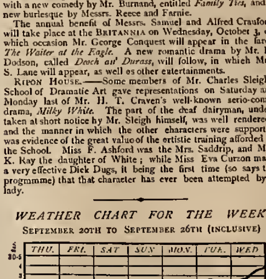
SEPTEMBER 20TH TO SEPTEMBER 26TH (INCLUSIVE)



Explanation.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.—The weather has been very cold throughout this period, the winds having been light from the northward, and the weather very cloudy in the daytime, but clear or foggy at night. On account of the clearing of the sky as night has come on the radiation of heat from the earth has been very great, frosts having occurred on the grass on four distinct occasions, and very low readings on two others. Some rain has fallen in London; but a larger quantity has been recorded in the northern and eastern counties, and soft hail in several places. The barometer was highest (30·38 inches) on Wednesday night last; lowest (29·77 inches) on Thursday, the 20th instant; range, 0·61 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (60·5°) on Wednesday, the 26th instant; lowest (33°) on Tuesday, the 25th instant; range, 27·5°. The wind has been northerly (north-west to north-east) and light in force. Rain: Total fall, 0·20 inches, on three days; greatest fall, 0·14 inches, on Thursday, the 20th instant.

Scraps

M. Offenbach's New Three-Act Opera, Les Contes d'Hoffmann, is to be produced this winter at the Paris Lyrique.

Bull Fights will probably be held in Paris during the Exhibition next year. They are to be on a mild scale, however, as no bull is to be killed in the arena.

Pigeon-Flying in the Black Country, a favourite Sunday amusement, is likely to be suppressed, as the Walsall Town Council have passed a bye-law prohibiting the practice in the public thoroughfares.

A Memorial to Mr. H. M. Stanley's Companion through Africa, Edward Pocock, who died when on the march to the Victoria Nyanza, will probably be erected at Rochester, Pocock having been born in a suburb of the city.

The Suez Canal has caused a noticeable difference in the depth of the Mediterranean, according to Engineering, which states that some Marseilles engineers have discovered that the level of the waters has sunk 3¼ inches since the opening of the Canal.

The Coming Fine Art Exhibition at Dundee bids fair to be the best ever held north of the Tweed. Loans will be sent from several of the London Museums, English artists will contribute largely, and the Queen has lent a valuable picture for exhibition.

A Barometrical Bonnet is the latest novelty in Paris. Ladies' headgear are now trimmed with flowers coloured with chloride of cobalt, which assume a dark blue colour in dry weather, but turn pink at the approach of rain, thus furnishin their fair wearers with a reliable weather glass.

A Dainty Dish for Epicures is mentioned in the Live Stock Journal, which states that the Paris Jardin d'Acclimatation has received two edible dogs from China—tiny fat animals, resembling pugs about the head. They are usually eaten when two months old, after being fed exclusively on rice and milk, and are roasted and served up in slices with soy.

The Indian Famine.——Mr. James Wyld, of Charing Cross and the Royal Exchange, has just published a small map of India, showing in colours the districts affected by the various famines of late years, especially that from which the Peninsula is now suffering. A sketch map is also appended showing the average rainfall of various parts of the country.

Tiger Hunters eager for sport should go to Sumatra, where tigers fairly swarm in the forests, as the natives are too apathetic to hunt their foes. In one part of the island alone forty-two men were eaten in six weeks, yet the Sumatrans resignedly sit down, and say that, as Heaven has so willed it, so therefore it must be, making no effort whatever towards the destruction of the tigers.

The First Living Specimens of the Large Monkey known as the Gelada Rüppellii ever brought to Europe, will shortly be shown in London. The monkeys inhabit the mountains of North Abyssinia, living on grass and roots, and when full-grown have a black mane nearly a foot long. Dr. Rüppell brought one of the skins from Abyssinia fifty years ago, but nothing has since been heard of the animals until the present time, when a pair and their young one have been captured.]

The Colorado Beetle is not a recent importation into Europe, if we are to believe a Hungarian correspondent of the Vienna Fremdenblatt. Herr Karl von Ladany asserts that his son some years ago found these identical beetles on the potato fields in his estates in the Banat, and still possesses specimens in an entomological collection. They are very common in Turkey and Roumania, and in 1858 the failure of the potato crop in Bulgaria and Roumelia was ascribed to their depredations.

The Pigeon-post Despatches used during the siege of Paris have so stimulated the process of stenography in France, that the Institut Stenographique has produced three copies of Marshal MacMahon's manifesto at the back of a postage stamp. Anent the manifesto, 12,000,000 copies were published in a day, and employed 4,890 persons in their production. The printing occupied 390 men and 30 machines, 4,000 were employed in fastening up and directing the manifestoes, 400 persons sorted them, and 100 people were employed to despatch them to their various destinations.

The Channel Tunnel has been fairly begun in France, where several pits have been sunk to the depth of 110 yards. The French and English companies formed for its construction will each possess one half, and will respectively supply the funds for each portion, while the excavation will be done in France by the Great Northern Railway, and in England by the South Eastern and Chatham and Dover lines. The materials of the French and English lines will pass through the tunnel in order to avoid delay and expense of transhipment, and as soon as the tunnel is completed the companies will endeavour to arrange for a similar exchange with other Continental lines. At the end of thirty years the tunnel will be ceded to the two Governments under certain conditions.

The Forthcoming Dairy Show.——From the entry-sheet of the show, which will open at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, on Wednesday next, it is evident in many respects the exhibition will be most interesting. The Baroness Burdett Coutts, for instance, takes the opportunity to advance one of her great ends, the suppression of cruelty to donkeys, and she is aided in that effort by several well-known noblemen and gentlemen. The exhibitors will include the Duke of Wellington, Duke of Beaufort, Baroness Burdett Coutts, Duke of Sutherland, Lady Emily Pigot, Lady Gwynde, Lord Ashburton, Miss Anna de Rothschild, Count Schlieffken, almost all the cheese factories established in England, Mr. Nuttall, of Leicester, who is sending no fewer than 3,000 Stilton cheeses, Mr. C. Sutherland, of Croydon, Lord Tourmour, Mrs. Neville Grenville, and a host of other ladies and gentlemen well known as exhibitors at special shows.

London Mortality has decreased during the last two weeks, and the deaths have numbered respectively 1,261 and 1,179, being 104 and 150 below the average, and at the rate of 18·6 and 17·4 per 1,000. The death rate for the twelve weeks of the present quarter has been 19·4 per 1,000 against 21·5 and 22·1 in the corresponding period of 1875 and 1876. The deaths from small-pox were, in the week ending September 15, 10 (an increase of 2), and a similar number were registered last week; those from scarlet fever were 38 (a rise of 9), and 30 (a decline of 8); from fever 30 (a rise of 9, and the highest number recorded this year), and 31 (an increase of 1); from diarrhœa, 86 (a decline of 1) and 71 (a fall of 15, and 35 below the average); from measles, 23 and 22 (a decline of 1); from whooping-cough, 32 (a rise of 13), and 18 (a decrease of 14); and from diphtheria, 7 and 8 (a rise of 1). Different forms of violence caused 39 and 40 deaths, of which 34 and 37 were the result of negligence or accident. There were 2,368 and 2,286 births, which were 63 and 71 below the average. The mean temperature was 58·9 deg., 1·3 deg. above the average during the first week, and 51·1 deg., 4·9 deg. below the average in the second week; and the duration of sunshine was 11·2 and 20·8 hours out of the 89·6 and 86·5 hours during which the sun was above the horizon.

The Graphic Telegrams from the Battlefields of the present war sent home to our daily contemporaries have been amusingly satirised by a Berlin journal, the Ulk, which according to Mayfair has improvised the following dialogue between Mr. Forbes, the well known correspondent of the Daily News, and Dr. Entoutcas, who is represented as being a correspondent at the seat of war. The two meet in the street, and Dr. Entoutcas thus addresses Mr. Forbes:—"Bon morning, Mr. Archibald, what mach you?"—"Oh, I am sehr very. Und you?"—"O, quasi! Segg mi, Mr. Archibald, wie mach you dat mit your fixity bei the Berichters?"—"Oh, very simply! I make meine Beschreibung of Schlacht schon vorher fin and ferty. Dann I go to the Russian Commandeur and segg to him: Hier is a fin Description, nu maken Sie mir mal 'ne Slacht danach. The Russian Commandeur, being a gefallig man, erweist mi the little pleasure, and damit all right!" This mixture of English, French, German and German patois, being translated, shows how Dr. Entoutcas compliments Mr. Forbes on the excellence of his description of the scenes of the war, and wants to know how he does it. Mr. Forbes replies that it is all very simple. "I prepare a full description of the battle in advance," he says. "I next go to the Russian Commander and say to him: "Here is a fine description, now get up a battle accordingly." "The Russian Commander, being an obliging man, does me the little favour, and then all right!"

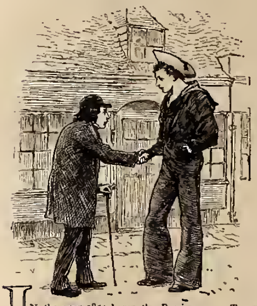
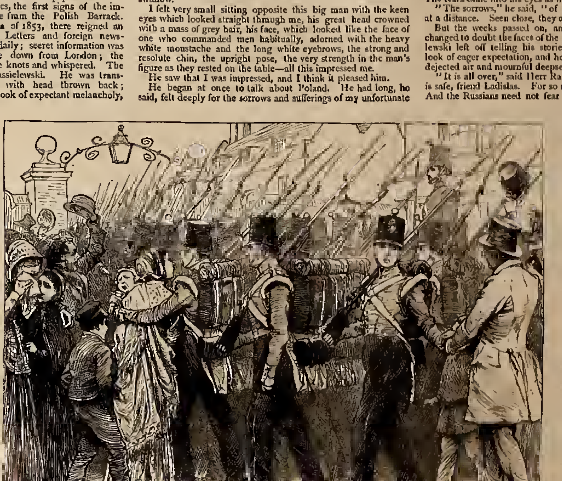
CHAPTER IX.

HOPES AND FEARS



IN the year 1854 began the Russian war. To me, because in those days I read few papers and took small interest in politics, the first signs of the impending struggle came from the Polish Barrack. Here, from the autumn of 1853, there reigned an unwonted animation. Letters and foreign newspapers were received daily; secret information was whispered about; strangers came down from London; the men gathered themselves into little knots and whispered. The most eager of them all was Wassielewski. He was transformed; he bore himself erect, with head thrown back; those deep-set eyes of his lost their look of expectant melancholy, and were bright with hope; he even seemed to have lost his limp. It was easy for me to understand that all this preliminary joy meant another rising in Poland. The weakness of Russia was to be the opportunity of my compatriots. In this quiet retreat they were plotting and conspiring. I came and went among them as I pleased, known to every one. They did not tell me their plans, but I observed that as they talked their eyes from time to time turned to me, and I discerned that they were discussing whether I should be made a conspirator with the rest and a sharer in their visions. I understood—it was only part of the general humiliation of a hunchback—that they were undecided whether one so useless physically could not be of use in the way of his name; whether, in fact, it was worth while to sacrifice my life, as well as their own, because I was Ladislas Pulaski. For the first time I felt a Pole indeed, in the strange thought that perhaps, after all, I, too, might be called upon to strike my blow, such as it was, for Polish freedom.



The streets were lined with the townspeople; the women crying, some of them even kissing the soldiers.

I had been kept strangely ignorant up to this time, and even later, of my own family history and of the circumstances under which I was brought to England. I knew that I was the son of a Polish noble; that my father perished in one of the obscure and hopeless village risings which took place some years after the great insurrection of 1831, and were too local to be recorded in contemporary history; also, that it was old Wassielewski who brought me, a mere infant, in his own arms, safely to England. When I asked the Captain for further information, he put off the question. When, as a boy, I asked Wassielewski, he patted my head kindly, and bade me wait. I understood, therefore, very early, that there was more to be told in somebody's good time.

I believe that it was by the Captain's wish that I was kept from the knowledge of things which might have maddened my boyish brain; because I can hardly give Wassielewski credit for an act of forbearance towards the credit of the Romanoff name which lasted twenty years.

In the spring of 1854, when it became quite certain that Russia would have to face the strangest combination of allies ever formed, the day of deliverance seemed to be dawning for Poland. It was a delusive hope, as we know, because Prussia and Austria, participes criminis, could not look on in silence while the Russian part of the divided land freed itself and set a bad example to their own Poles. I have sometimes dreamed an impossible thing—that Germany, which pretends to be the most advanced outpost of civilisation, and Austria, which boasts of her easy rule, might some day join together and restore their share in the unholy partition to Liberty. What madness possessed them ever to dismember that ancient kingdom of independent Slavs, which could never threaten Germany and stood as a bulwark against the barbaric Muscovite? But it was a foolish dream. Nations never voluntarily make reparation. Unto the fourth and even the fifth generation they pay for crimes in their children's blood; but they do not make atonement for the sin.

While the hopes of the exiles were highest Wassielewski began to tell me tales of Polish daring and Russian cruelty.

"You are a Pole," he used to finish his narrative, "remember always that you are a Pole. You owe yourself to your country. It may be your duty, as well as mine, to die in her cause. The day is coming when you will have to act."

But, as yet, nothing of my father.

In those days, too, Herr Räumer first began to talk to me. I met him at Mr. Tyrrell's office, and he invited me to visit him at his lodgings, which were, as I have explained, the first floor of Augustus Brambler's house.

Here he received me with great cordiality. Indoors he removed the blue spectacles, which he habitually wore in the streets, and showed a pair of keen bright eyes which certainly did not look as if they required any shelter from the light. His room was furnished with great simplicity, like the quarters of an officer on active service—a table, a sideboard, one or two chairs—his own being a wooden armchair—a slip of carpet before the fire—a pianoforte—constituted all that his simple wants required. On the wall hung one or two weapons, a pair of rapiers crossed, a rifle, and a brace of pistols. On the mantle shelf were two or three pipes and a cigar case. In the open sideboard I observed a goodly row of bottles, which I rightly judged from their shape and colour of the glass to contain German wine. Herr Raumer drank every day a bottle of this for dinner and another bottle before going to bed. He had one of those heads which are never the worse for wine, however much they swallow.

I felt very small sitting opposite this big man with the keen eyes which looked straight through me, his great head crowned with a mass of grey hair, his face, which looked like the face of one who commanded men habitually, adorned with the heavy white moustache and the long white eyebrows, the strong and resolute chin, the upright pose, the very strength in the man's figure as they rested on the table—all this impressed me.

He saw that I was impressed, and I think it pleased him.

He began at once to talk about Poland. He had long, he said, felt deeply for the sorrows and sufferings of my unfortunate country. Unhappily, as I knew, he was a German, and in Germany there were some sympathies which were not to be openly expressed. If a German gentleman, he said, desired liberty of the Press, freedom of discussion, elevation of the masses, liberal institutions, the restoration of Poland, or any kindred thing, it behoved him to be silent and possess his soul in patience. Here in England, and the doors closed, alone with a Polish gentleman, he could speak his mind. The fact was, the condition of things not only in Russia, but also in Austria and Prussia, was deplorable. He saw before him one who had suffered in the cause—I thought afterwards that my own exertions in the cause as a year-old baby hardly entitled me to speak as a martyr—he could tell me cases of Russian cruelty which would make my blood boil.

"There is," he said, "thank Heaven, left to mankind the sacred duty of rebellion. The Czar knows of this, and trembles on his throne. From generation to generation the duty is handed down. Even now," his voice sank to a whisper, "even at this very moment, it is whispered that the Poles are meditating another insurrection. Russia's weakness is Poland's opportunity. While her energies are all bent upon the war the Poles will rise again, and proclaim the Republic of Warsaw. But of course your friends in the Polish Barrack tell you all that is going on."

"Indeed they do not," I replied, with a jealous feeling that if they did I should hardly be justified in retailing their information to one who, however much he might sympathise with the cause, was certainly not a Pole.

"I imagine," he said, "but, of course I know nothing, that an attempt will be made this very year. It seems a favourable moment. The Polish exiles will return to join in the movement. It is devoutly to be hoped that they might succeed. And so Wassielewski tells you nothing. It seems hardly fair."

"Nothing." It did not strike me till afterwards that it was strange that Herr Räumer should know anything of Wassielewski.

"Ah! he thinks the time has not yet come. And yet you are seventeen, you are strong, and can handle a gun. It is not well of Wassielewski. Courage, my boy. I prophesy that many a Russian shall fall by your hand yet."

He always spoke on the assumption that another outbreak was to come, that I was to take part in it, and that the Poles were keeping the knowledge of my own past back from me. The prospect had its charm, even to me, the peaceful musician. I do believe that, hunchback as I was, I should have played the part of a man had Fate willed that I was to revisit my native country.

He changed the subject and presently began talking about music. Then he sat at the pianoforte and began to run his fingers up and down the keys. He could not play, but he possessed—many men do—an almost instinctive power of picking out melodies and filling them with simple chords. He asked me if I knew the German national airs, and then he began to sing them. We all know them now, these simple lieder with the tears in every bar—but twenty years ago they were not so well known. He sung them sentimentally, and if it had not been for that strange rasp in the voice, musically. The tears came into his eyes as he sang.

"The sorrows," he said, "of other people are so very sad—at a distance. Seen close, they annoy."

But the weeks passed on, and nothing was done. As hope changed to doubt the faces of the Poles grew despondent, Wassielewski left off telling his stories of Polish valour; he lost his look of eager expectation, and he hung his head, as before, with dejected air and mournful deepset eyes.

"It is all over," said Herr Raumer one evening. "Your life is safe, friend Ladislas. For so much you ought to be thankful. And the Russians need not fear your rifle for another year or two. No doubt," he added, with a gentle sneer, "they are thankful, too."

"Why is it all over?"

"Because Austria and Prussia will not permit revolt. Have they not got Poles of their own?"

I began to declaim about the wickedness of Governments and statesmen.

Herr Räumer heard me politely.

Then he filled another pipe, leaving the old one to cool, drank two glasses of hock, and replied slowly.

"Quite true, Ladislas Pulaski. No doubt at your age I should have thought, and perhaps said, the same thing. The wickedness of diplomatists is a reproach to modern civilisation. Yet, if you consider the matter, you will acknowledge that without their wickedness, there would be really very little in life worth having. No indignation, no sermons, no speakers at meetings, no societies. What a loss to Great Britain!"

"We could do without societies," I said.

"A great deal more would go if political and other wickedness are to go. There would be no armies, no officers, no lawyers, no doctors, no clergymen. The newspapers would have nothing to say, because the course of the world could be safely predicted by any one. All your learned professions would be gone at a blow."

I laughed.

"Music and painting would remain."

"But what would the painters do for subjects? You can't create any interest in the picture of a fat and happy family. There would be no materials for pathos. No one would die under a hundred; and, as he would be a good man there would be no doubt about his after fate. No one would be ill. All alike would be virtuous, contented, happy——and dull."

"Why dull?"

"Why dull? Because there would be nothing left to fight, to fear, to guard against. Dull?" he took his pipe from his mouth, and yawned. "Dull? The human brain cannot conceive of a more appalling, of a more sleepy dulness than that of the world gone good."

"At least the rulers of the world are supposed to be always trying to bring that end about."

"Supposed, my young friend? Yes, by you, and enthusiastic young gentlemen like yourselves. Dull? Why, if you think of it, you would not even have your virtues left, because there would be no need for them. Bravery, self-denial, patience, resignation, patriotism, thrift,—these would all vanish, because there would be no longer any occasion for them. No, Ladislas Pulaski, the wickedness of diplomatists keeps the world alive.

There are always plenty of fools to shout, fling up their caps, believe everything they are told, and go away to get killed. The world go good? Much as I deplore the wickedness of wicked man, I trust that general goodness may not happen in my time."

Herr Räumer was right. There was no Polish rising. But our little colony was broken up and thinned by the departure of many of the exiles. Some went out on secret service; some fought in the Turkish lines; a few volunteered in the English and French armies; some joined the German Legion. But Wassielewski stayed on, sadder, more hollow-eyed, than ever.

. . . .

One day, about the beginning of the war, I was saluted in the street—it was on the Hard—by a tall and good-looking young sailor, in his naval rig.

"Hope you're well, sir."

It was Jem Hex.

I shook hands with him. He told me that he was going aboard the Impérieuse for the Baltic Sea Fleet, and that they hoped to have a lively time.

The Baltic Fleet! The war was a real thing, then. And good-natured Jem was going to have the honour of fighting for his country.

He seemed to take it very easily; and he had all the old sea-dog's confidence in thrashing the enemy.

I asked him after Moses.

"Moses," he replied, in a hesitating way. "Moses—well—Mr. Pulaski,—if I were you, sir,—I don't think I'd ask about Moses. He hasn't turned out—not what you might call a credit."

One figure I missed, among others, from the row of wooden-legged veterans on the beach.

It was that of Mrs. Jeram's erring husband. The old man fell off his stool one night, outside his wife's house, in a fit. She took him in and nursed him till he died. So they were reconciled. And then Mrs. Jeram came to be housekeeper to the Captain.

CHAPTER X.

WAR! I was eighteen at the close of the "long, long, cancer of Peace," as Tennyson called it—why does every poet try to be a Tyrtæus? And why should holy Peace be called cancerous?—The country put on its rusty armour, sharpened its swords, and sent out aged Generals brought up in old traditions of Peninsular times. When news came of the first Turkish successes at Oltenitza, and we read of the gallant defence of Silistria, one began to realise that we were actually in the piping times of war. For my own part, I was pleased and excited, independently of my private, and Polish, reasons for excitement. It seemed to my foolish understanding that the forty years since Waterloo, those years in which the world had done so much in a quiet and peaceful way to make wars more bloody, had been quite wasted and thrown away. The making of railways, the construction of steamers, the growth of great armaments, were things done slowly and without dramatic tableaux. Now what the world likes, in contemplating the never-ending human comedy, is that from time to time the curtain should fall for a few moments on a thrilling and novel situation. This we were going to have.

"It is splendid, Cis," I cried, with the latest war news in my hand. "Splendid. Now we are going to live in history. We too shall hear hymns to the God of battles; we shall understand the meaning of the war fever; we shall know how men feel who live in a time of battles, sieges, and victories."

Celia did not respond as I expected to this newly-born martial enthusiasm.

"And the soldiers will be killed," she said, sadly. "The poor soldiers. What does war mean to them but death and wounds?"

"And glory, Cis. They die for their country."

"I would rather they lived for their country. Laddy, if the new history that we are going to live in is to be like the old, I wish it was over and done with. For the old is nothing but the murdering of soldiers. I am sick of reading how the world can get no justice without fighting for it."

Looked at from Celia's point of view, I have sometimes thought that there is something in her statement. So many kings; so many battles; so many soldiers fallen on the field of honour. Blow the trumpets; beat the drums; bring along the car of Victory; have a solemn Te Deum; and then sit down and make all things ready for the next campaign.

"What good," this foolish young person went on, "does the glory of a nameless soldier shut in a field, and buried in a trench, do to his mourning people? I know, Laddy, needs must that war come, but let him who appeals to the sword die by the sword."

When General Février laid low the author of the world's disturbance, and the Poles lamented, because their enemy was gone before they had had time to throw one more defiance in his teeth, I thought of Celia's words, and they seemed prophetic.

"Why do the Russians fight the Turks?" she went on. "What harm have Turks done to Russians, or Russians to Turks?"

I suggested outraged and oppressed Christians.

"Then let the Christians rise and free themselves," she went on, "and let us help them. But not in the Czar's way. And as for the soldiers, would they not all be far happier at home?"

Nor could any argument of mine alter her opinion on this point: a heresy which strikes at the very root of all wars.

To be sure, if we read history all through—say the history of Gibbon, the most bloodthirsty historian I know—it would be difficult to find a single one out of his wars that was chosen by the people. "Now then, you drilled men," says King or Kaiser, "get up and kill each other." The Official Gazette proclaims the popular enthusiasm, shouting of war cries, and tossing of caps—the value of which we know in this critical age. But the people do not get up of their own accord. There is a good deal of fighting again in the Chronicles of old Froissart, but I remember no mention anywhere of popular joy over it. The historian is too honest to pretend such nonsense. In fact it never occurred to him that people could like it. They were told to put on their iron hats, grasp their pikes, and make the best of things. They obeyed with resignation; their fathers had done the same thing; they had been taught that war was one of the sad necessities of life,—that, and pestilence, and the tyranny of priests, and the uncertainty of justice; you had to fight just as you had to work, or to be born, or to die; the pike was an emblem of fate. For wise and mysterious purposes it was ordained by Providence that you were to be cuffed and beaten by your officers before being poked through the body by the iron point of the enemy's pike. It has been, hitherto, impossible for mankind to get out of this mediæval way of thinking; some Continental nations, who believe they are quite the advance guard of civilisation, even go so far as to preserve the cuffing to this day as part of their Heaven-sent institutions. It is taught in the schools as belonging to the Divine Order, and therefore to be taken with resignation. At the same time, we need not go so far as to expect actual love for cuffing—with desire for more cuffing—from modern Prussians any more than from mediæval French or English.

Not one single common soldier, among all the millions who make up the rank and file of modern armies, wants to go fighting. And yet what a lot of fighting there is!

Suppose, some day, when the glorious army on either side was ordered to advance, the brave fellows were to sit down instead with a cheerful grin, leaving the Kings to fight out the quarrel in a duel.

Now and then, things getting really intolerable, the people wake up, and have a Jacquerie, a Revolution, or a Reformation. But that is civil war, the only kind of war which the unpatriotic mob really cares about.

"All the world," said foolish Cis, "praying daily for peace. And praying for peace since ever they began to pray at all. And what has come of it?"

"I do not see much good," said the Captain, who took the mediæval view about war, "in praying for what you must help yourself to. If all the world agreed on peace, there would be peace. And then it would be no good having a bigger fleet than your neighbour." .

I try to put my obvious point in a new and striking light: that nations who will not sit still, but get up quarrels with other nations, ought to have all their arms taken from them. Fancy Russia without an army or a fleet, obliged to live peacefully and develop herself! Why, in ten years she would be civilised; and then we should see strange things. But my point, however cleverly put, will not convince the Captain, whose opinions on the necessity of war are based upon the advantages of a superior fleet.

After all, it is a great thing to be the adopted son of a land, like this Isle of England, which can never again, we hope, be made to serve the ambition of kings and priests; never more drive her sons by the thousand to the slaughter-house, or her daughters to lamentation and tears for aggrandisement. The only country in Europe of which such a boast may be made.

When will it cease? When will men be strong enough to say, "Enough; we will have no more of your military caste; we will have no more of your great armies; we will never fight again, except to defend ourselves?"

And Russia to set herself up as the protector of Christians! Russia to be the advocate of humanity! Russia the champion of civilisation! Ask the opinions of Poland on these points; go seek those of Turkestan; of Circassia; of Khiva; of Siberia. Call on the Czar and the Court to tell their secret history which everybody knows; on the nobles to lay bare the story of their lives; on the officers to confess their barbaric licence; on the judges and officials to confess their corruption; on the priests to explain how they set the example of a Christian life. Call on police, secret agents, spies, ministers, governors, and soldiers to speak of Russia's Christian virtues in brutal beatings, torture of mind as well as body, infamous delations, universal bribery, filthy prisons, and inhuman punishments. That done, wish the arms of Russia success, and pray that all the world may become Cossack, and the kings of the world imitators of the Czar.

But I am a Pole, and may be supposed consequently to hate Russia. That is a popular error. The Poles do not hate Russians. Their qualities, their characteristics, are ours, because we are all of one common stock; as for their vices, they are encouraged by the governing class, because without the degradation of ignorance and drink they could not be depended on, these poor moujiks, to obey orders. We only hate the Romanoffs, who are Germans. But we like the Russians. And the English people will find out, on that day when the great unwieldy empire drops to pieces, and the spectre of the Romanoff terror is laid for ever, what good qualities there are in Russian, Muscovite, or Pole, and how by the aid of the Devil, who invented autocratic rule, the good has been perverted into evil.

But what had the English and the Russian soldier done to each other, that they should be made to fight?

A most foolish and jealous girl's question. And yet—and yet——

And yet——it was pitiful to see our brave fellows, full of fire and enthusiasm, go down the narrow streets of the town to the Dockyard gates on their way to the East. They marched in loose order, headed by the Colonel, the bands playing "The Girl I left behind me." The streets were lined with the townspeople; the women crying, some of them even kissing the soldiers; the men waving hats and shouting; the children laughing and running for joy at so splendid a spectacle. Among the honest faces of the rough and rude soldiers—far rougher, far ruder then than now—you could see none that were not lifted proudly, flushed with hope. Drill the Muscovite and send him out to fight; he will go, and he will fight as he has been taught, a dogged, obedient creature. He asks for no reason, he neither questions nor criticises. When he begins to question, the end of the Romanoffs will not be far distant. Drill a Frenchman and order him into the field. He goes with a yell and a rush like a tiger. And he is as dangerous as a man-eater. The German, who, more than all men, hates soldiering, goes unwilling, patient, sad. He is among other men the least pleased to fight. But the Englishman goes willingly, quietly, and without shouting. He likes fighting. And if he begins he means to go on.

When the Dockyard gates closed upon the Adjutant and the Doctor, who rode last, men and women alike turned away with choking throats and swelling hearts, ashamed to shed the tears that stood in their eyes.

The men were going to fight for their country. Could there be a nobler thing than to fight, and for that sacred cause to die?

And yet, Celia asked, what had Russians and Englishmen done to each other that they should fight?

Some day, perhaps even in my own time, the pale figure of Revolution, red-capped, gaunt, and strong, will stalk into the Summer Palace, and bring out the Romanoffs, disturbers of the world's peace, one by one. "See," she will say to the onlookers, "they are but men, these Czars, two-forked radishes, like yourselves. They are not stronger, bigger-brained, or longer-lived than you. They are troubled by exactly the same passions; they have no better education than the best of you. But they must have war to delude ignorant people, and keep them from asking questions. As for you eighty millions, you want peace, with the chance of growing crops, and enjoying sweet love of wife and children. Once get this family with all their friends across the frontier, with strict orders that they are not to come back any more, and you shall have all that you reasonably want."

That is what the eager-faced woman with the Phrygian cap said, eighty years ago, to the French, who believed her, and proceeded to act in the courage of their convictions. They made a mess of it, because they expected too much. But they set an example, and we have not yet seen the end of that example.

Day after day the tramp of soldiers down the streets, infantry, cavalry, artillery, all alike lighthearted, all starting on the journey of death as if it were a picnic.

When the news came of the first fighting we grew less tender-hearted, and sent out fresh squadrons with the same enthusiasm but fewer tears. The war fever was upon us, pulses beat fiercely, we had less thought for the individual men and more for the army. We were bound to win somehow, and the soldiers went out to win for us. If they fell—but we did not think too much, then, about falling. Individual life is only valuable in time of peace. In times of war it has a commercial value of its own—life for life, and perhaps one life for ten if we are lucky.

"I dare say," said the Captain one day, "that there is a Russian way of looking at things, though hang me if I can see it. But mark me, Laddy, unless a man sticks tight as wax to his own side, shuts his ears to the other side, won't hear of an argument, that man can't fight happy. There's no comfort in a battle unless you feel you're on the Lord's side. Wherefore hang all sea lawyers, and let every man, now, hate a Russian as if he were the Devil."

To do our Red Jackets justice, that is about what they did.

Besides the long lines of soldiers embarking every week in the huge transports there were the preparation and the despatch of the great and splendid Black Sea and Baltic Fleets.

It is something to have lived in a time when such ships were to be seen. It is a memory which binds one to the past to think of that day, in March, 1854, when the Baltic Fleet set sail amid the prayers of the nation. Never was so gallant a fleet sent forth from any shore, never were shores more crowded with those who came to criticise and stayed to cheer. We had already—Cis and I among the number—cheered old Charley Napier when he walked down the pier to embark on his ship, pounding the timbers with his sturdy little legs as if they had been so many Russians. To-day he was on board the Duke of Wellington, the biggest ship in the world, a great floating fortress mounting a hundred and thirty-one guns, built to sail when wind was fair, with a crew of a thousand men, and an admiral who meant fighting. No one who ever saw that day will forget the departure of the Fleet. It was a fresh and breezy day in March, the sun came out in occasional gleams, and shot long arrows of light athwart the clouds. The sea was dark with multitudes of boats, yachts, steamers, and craft of all kinds; the shore was black with the thousands who sat there watching for the signal to be given. And riding at anchor lay the ships on whom the fortunes of England depended. There was the St. Jean d'Acre of a hundred guns, the Royal George of a hundred and twenty—she floated over the place where lay the bones of her namesake, the flagship of Admiral Kempenfeldt, when he went down with "twice four hundred men," and almost as many women; the Princess Royal of ninety-one guns; the Impérieuse and the Arrogant—I was launched on board the Arrogant, and remembered her well—there were, all told, in that Baltic Fleet, though all were not gathered together, between fifty and sixty ships. Presently we saw the Queen's steamer, the Fairy—the pretty little yacht, with her three sloping masts—threading her graceful way swiftly in and out of the ships, while the Jack-tars manned the yardarm, and cheered till the shore took it up with echoes and the counter-cheering of the spectators. When the old men with Nehemiah saw the diminished glories of the Second Temple they lifted up their voices and wept. When the old men on our shore saw the magnified glories of the Victorian fleet, they lifted up their voices and wept, thinking of the days that were no more, the breezy battle with a foe who dared to fight, the long chase of a flying enemy, the cutting-out, the harvest of a score of prizes. This time, with better ships, better crews, we were going on a fool's quest, because all the good we did was to keep the Russians within their port. Well, our trade was safe. That was a great thing. The ships would go up and down the broad ocean without fear of the Russians, because these were all skulking behind Cronstadt towers. I am not a Muscov, but a Pole, yet I was ashamed for the Russian sailors, who were not allowed to strike a blow for their country, while the soldiers were dying in thousands, dogged, silent, long-suffering, in obedience to the Czar whom they ignorantly worship.

They sailed, the Queen leading the way. Out flew the white canvas, fluttering for a moment in the windy sunshine, and then, with set purpose, bellying full before the breeze, and marshalling each brave ship to her place in the grand procession.

The Armada passed out of sight, and we all went home. The Captain was moved to the extent of a double ration that night; also, he sang a song. And at prayers, he invented a new petition of his own for the honour and safety of the Fleet. There were occasions, he said, when if a man did not feel religious he didn't deserve to be kept on the ship's books any longer. And he told us—Cis was staying with us that day—for a thousandth time the story of Navarino.

When the fleets were gone, and the soldiers nearly all sent off, we began to look for news. For a long time there came little. Charley Napier told his men to sharpen their cutlasses; that was just what the old fellow would do, because if he got a chance of fighting, he meant fighting. But he did not get that chance. Within the fortress of Cronstadt, in ignoble safety, lay the Russian fleet, afraid to come out. There was a little bombardment of Swenborg, Helsingfors, and Bomarsund; we made as much as we could of it at the time, but it was not like the fighting which the old men remembered. And only a few prizes, here and there. One was brought in, I remember, by the Argus, at sight of which we all turned out to cheer. The Captain sorrowfully said that in the good old days when he entered the Navy, about the year 1805, he might have been in command of a dozen such prizes every year.

A SCOTCH VILLAGE INDUSTRY

WITHIN a stone's throw of the unpretentious house where Robert Burns was married, and almost under the shadow, so to speak, of dilapidated Mauchline Tower, a curious industry has established itself. The village of Mauchline does not look in any way like a manufacturing centre. There is a drowsiness about the place, and an apparent absence of life and energy, which would seem to mark it as a purely agricultural hamlet. Yet from this secluded spot the world is almost exclusively supplied with articles needing much taste and delicacy of manipulation for their manufacture. Mauchline works in wood, and for fifty years past has been turning out goods of a certain sort without any equal either at home or abroad. Go where one may, to Paris or Calcutta, to New York or Melbourne, and some of the quiet little village's handiwork will almost certainly be found in the shops. Most people must have noticed, at one time or another, a certain wooden ware, beautifully smooth, very highly polished, and finished with great care. Formerly it was generally covered with a tartan pattern, but now we also see flowers, fruit, ferns, scenes, portraits, and, in short, almost every sort of artistic ornamentation impressed into the service. Go to Ilfracombe or Bray, to Tenby or Scarborough, to Bognor or Port Madoc, and you will certainly have your attention drawn to some such ware by the local shopkeepers. And a very good trade they drive, owing to an impression among visitors that the articles have been made somewhere in the neighbourhood, and will therefore form suitable souvenirs. This notion proceeds generally from the ornamentation being directly connected with the place or its vicinity. Perhaps the trifle, whatever it may be, bears the interesting legend, "made of wood growing near the birthplace of Chaucer," or "part of a rustic seat on which Fair Rosamond rested when passing through Dulborough." In this event what wandering mortal could forbear effecting a considerable purchase of goods thus stamped with the hall-mark of English history? Perhaps they would not be agreeably surprised to learn that the majority of such articles come from an Ayrshire village situated in the centre of "the land o' Burns." This is the fact, nevertheless.

Somewhere about fifty years ago a shrewd Scot living at Mauchline noticed the increasing number of pilgrims who came every year to pay their homage to the memory of the great national poet by visiting the scenes amid which he passed so many years of his not too happy life. Could not some profit be made out of this annual pilgrimage? It seemed so, and the result was that the aforesaid cannie Mauchliner established a humble workshop in the village for the manufacture of souvenirs from wood grown in the "land o' Burns." They were rough things, these boxes and what not, that he turned out, but the eager demand for them soon provided him with sufficient capital to buy simple machinery. Still the demand grew faster than the supply, so that first one building, then another, had to be added to the premises until they are now found covering quite a large area, and giving employment, both steady and remunerative, to no less than 200 hands, male and female. This success of the parent establishment has brought about the establishment of two other similar factories in the village, but neither does anything like the same amount of business as the famous "Original Box Works." It must not be imagined, however, that the triumph was achieved without arduous labour. The founder had many obstacles to surmount before "Mauchline ware" began to be well spoken of in the fancy goods trade, on account of its perfect finish and strength. Year after year some new mechanical invention took the place of hand-work, nor did the proprietor rest content until he had assembled around him every sort of machine capable of being turned to account.

Then he began to look farther afield for customers than the "land o' Burns." If the votaries of that poet liked to carry back with them souvenirs made near the place where he once lived, why should not other localities in the United Kingdom—nay, on the Continent as well—do a similar trade? Most places have some sort of idol, either a bit of striking scenery, a grand old ruin, or a deceased celebrity, with which they are identified in the popular mind, and although every townlet and village could not be expected to set up a box works devoted to the promotion of hero-worship, Mauchline was prepared to aid the good purpose by the most effectual means. If Little Pedlington wants souvenirs ornamented with its parish pump, all it has to do is to send either photographs or prints of that glorious institution to Mauchline, and its wishes will be duly and promptly carried out. Mr. McQueen, the intelligent manager of the parent works, is ready to undertake almost any commission on these conditions, so that you may even have a piece of ware decorated with the portraits of your children or the picture of your porch.

Entering a two-storied red sandstone house from the high road, you are first shown a pile of wooden logs, awaiting conversion into souvenirs. Some have come from the neighbourhood; others from distant places; before they leave the premises, they will be fashioned into a multiplicity of forms, most of them exceedingly graceful and pretty. This lot lately formed part of a copse growing near old Alloway Church, the scene of Tam o' Shanter's ghostly revelry; the next batch originated on the banks of the Avon, not far from Stratford; here we have some finely grained blocks from the lynns of Lynmouth; there is a piece of dark-coloured wood brought home by a gallant major from the Mauritius, which he wishes to have made into a casket for shells. In short, there is no sort of job Mr. McQueen will not undertake in wood-work, unless it be the manufacture of artistic idols for the prople of Africa. And he would probably feel sorely tempted even in that instance. Such, then, is the raw material. As for the processes by which it is converted, they are far too numerous for full description, as may be imagined from the following list of only a few of the articles turned out:—Album-bindings, spill-holders, envelope-boxes, napkin-rings, paper-knives, photograph-frames, card-boxes, pen-wipers, hairbrush-backs, egg-stands, smelling-bottle holders, cribbage-boards, match-boxes, chimney-piece ornaments, and cigar-cases. The patterns are equally endless. Here you come across some beautiful little caskets, with dainty sprigs of flowers, apparently hand-painted, on a black ground. These are for a well-known Parisian firm, who have merely sent over certain coloured patterns for the outsides, leaving the rest to the taste and ingenuity of the manager. In another room, a dozen or so of tidy girls are transferring from engravings on to the prepared wood. The process seems to consist in placing the cut, face downwards, on the surface to be ornamented, which has been previously well varnished, and after it has dried the paper is rubbed off, leaving the picture by itself on the wood. When this is done there only remains some more polishing and varnishing before the article is fit for issue. In the case of photographs and coloured patterns, the face of the picture is left uppermost, the paper remaining on the wood and being almost incorporated therewith by repeated varnishings. So well is this done that some water-colour sketches of Ballochmyle, and other beautiful spots in the neighbourhood of Mauchline, look as if they were really painted on the wood. The tartan patterns, which at one time were in such eager request, are neither incorporated nor transferred. These are traced out, line after line, by a delicate machine containing a row of mathematical pens, which first rule off all the red lines, then the greens, blues, yellows, and other colours in rotation. As soon as all the lines running in one direction are thus traced, the material—a sort of fine canvas—is shifted to a right angle, and the cross-lines are similarly put in. Ultimately the canvas is employed in the same way as photographs and coloured patterns. But the noteworthy fact is, that this intricate machine has been invented almost entirely at Mauchline, first one improvement being added, then another, until its present perfection was reached.

As regards the processes by which the wooden blocks are converted into dainty ware, it will suffice to say that each article goes through quite a dozen different hands before it leaves the factory. Steam power is employed throughout, and one feels quite astonished at the variety of the machinery in the different rooms. In this completeness of mechanical appliances lies the main reason why an insignificant village in Ayrshire has been able to retain an almost exclusive monopoly of a prosperous and profitable industry. It can turn out wooden ware at lower rates than other localities, because the cost of production has been minimised by the substitution of machine work for hand labour in all possible cases. Thus it happens that some French firms habitually order from Mauchline the very goods which they afterwards sell in London and elsewhere as veritable articles de Paris.

HAROUN ALRASCHID

"TWO TALES OF MARRIED LIFE"—"Hard to Bear," by G. M. Craik; "A True Man," by M. C. Stirling (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—A good many persons will be inclined to think that the moral of these "Two Tales of Married Life" points in the same direction as the famous "Don't" which constituted Punch's "Advice to People About to Marry." Considering the sex of the authors it is not to be wondered at that in each story it is the husband—though after a different fashion, and with different results—who is represented as the disturber of conjugal felicity; but we cannot help, all the same, thinking of the remark of the lion, that if he and his kind possessed the gift of painting the habitual relations between men and lions might be represented after another manner. It is hardly necessary to say, Miss Craik's position among novelists being what it is, that her story is very much the better of the two. Roger Langton, a scholarly and refined man of two or three and thirty, who seems much older from the effects, as is conjectured, of some disappointment, comes to find his chief solace and delight in the society of Norah Etheridge, and without being in the least "in love" with her, or seeking to make her think so, marries her because only thus can he secure to himself the right and the power to engross her. Loving him with all her heart, the girl thinks at first that it will be bliss sufficient to have his constant companionship, and to feel that, though his love may be denied her, she is yet nearer to him than the rest of the world. But ere long she finds that to be at once so near him and so far from him is "hard to bear," and the hardship is augmented by the appearance on the scene, in the character of an interesting young widow, of the beautiful and fascinating coquette, who, after jilting Mr. Langton for a more favoured suitor, now sets herself to bring him once more under her sway. Norah is now slighted and neglected, and, from having been little to her husband, bids fair to become nothing at all. How, by a change of tactics at once adroit and daring, she succeeds in overcoming her husband's indifference, and winning from him all that measure of love it is in his nature to bestow upon any one, we must leave our readers to gather from story itself. It is told with Miss Craik's wonted grace and pleasantness, though, as will have been seen from the few words we have said about it, it cannot boast of much in the way of novelty, and Mr. Langton's action often strikes us as hardly consistent with the character assigned to him. Such a man, we take it, would have resented being made unhappy far too deeply to come again under the influence of the woman who had caused his trouble. Women, it is said, will readily pardon when they have once really loved; but we much doubt this being the case with men, especially men of Roger Langton's stamp. In "A True Man" the heroine's unhappiness comes from her having made an ideal hero out of a thoroughly commonplace and rather coarse nature, and discovering her mistake too late. Cecil Harcourt, the "true man" who watches over her like a guardian spirit, never letting her suspect that she is the one love of his life, is a fine character, though almost too perfect to seem altogether real. But the tale is interesting, and worth reading.

"For This Cause," by Robert Thynne, author of "Ravensdale," &c. (3 vols.: Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.).—We cannot say much for this novel, which is at once complicated and of feeble interest; abounding in mysteries that fail to come to anything, and in episodes that are mere excrescences, and not amusing excrescences either. As it furnishes the title of the story we suppose the main interest must be taken to lie in the conduct of the heroine, if she is so to be deemed, one Marion Carbeny, of Carbeny Castle, who, after her marrying a certain dissipated Captain Jack Martin in order that her marriage portion may save him from the disgrace and ruin that will otherwise be his lot—disgrace and ruin due very much, as she knows, to the influence and example of her own father—in spite of her love for him leaves him at the church door, and refuses to live with him, or even to bear his name, because she believes that he was in honour bound to marry another woman. Whereupon Captain Jack grows more and more wild and reckless, and sinks lower and lower in the social scale; until in the end his wife is brought to see that when a woman takes a husband at the altar she takes him for worse as well as better, and that her duty is to keep beside him, and not leave him to fight his battle alone. Martin, who is not at bottom a bad fellow, turns over a new leaf, and we leave the pair with every promise of peace and happiness attending them in new scenes. Much of the story, again, is occupied with the fortunes of a Major Mallow, and the question whether or not he is being unjustly kept out of a legacy which, if the truth could be got at, has been left him by his late relative, Lord Killery, but, to say the truth, the author does not succeed in persuading us to feel any keen interest in the inquiry. We are afraid that we must pronounce "For This Cause" nothing else but a failure, but it is only fair to say that some of the descriptions of Dublin "slums" we come upon in it have a certain vividness, which may also be said of the picture of life within the Dublin Marshalsea prison for debtors.

"The Rector of Oxbury," by James B. Baynard (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—"Chapters in the Life of a Congregational Minister" would be a more appropriate title for this book than "The Rector of Oxbury." The part which the Rev. Clement Maxforth, the ecclesiastic who fills that post, plays in the piece is small and unimportant, and it is the Rev. Philip Holland, the minister of Grange Street, Chapel, who is beyond all question the true hero. We cannot say that Mr. Baynard shows much force or skill as a novelist, yet his book has an interest as a picture, drawn evidently from fact of a kind of life with which most of us are altogether unfamiliar, that of a petty Dissenting community in a country town. Of course Grange Street Chapel is not "Salem," but the deacons and "Church members" of Mr. Holland's quarrelsome and unruly congregation are drawn with sufficient fidelity and distinctness to make us realise what thorns in the flesh they must have proved to their sensitive pastor. The picture we have in these volumes of the tyranny exercised by "the flock," and the discourtesy and insolence of leading members of it towards the man they profess to regard as their spiritual guide will come upon most readers altogether as a startling revelation of certain aspects of "voluntaryism," and we cannot be surprised that we leave Mr. Holland preparing to abandon Dissent as unfavourable "for the growth of the highest kinds of Christian life," and to enter the Church of England. It is likely enough that some among the sketches in the book are over-highly coloured, still in its main outlines it would impress us as accurate.

We have also received a new edition, in one volume, of Mr. Hardy's novel, "A Pair of Blue Eyes" (H. S. King and Co.), a tale unfortunate only in its title, and which some among the author's critics think on the whole the most highly finished work we have yet had from him.

ROUGHING IT

NOT the least striking characteristic of Englishmen in all parts of the world is their fondness for escaping from the ordinary grooves and trammels of social life, and for doing something out of the ordinary. Men with the bluest blood of England running in their veins, bred up to every luxury and comfort of life, men who at home have but to command and they are obeyed, to demand and they are served, simply for novelty and excitement turn explorers, hunters, and wanderers of their own free will, and with their whole hearts thrown into the cause.

To no one but an Englishman is there any charm in roughing it. Tear Jules and Alphonse from their cafés, their boulevards, their concerts and balls, and send them off to some hardly-known region with their kits on their backs, and tell them to spend a month in active exertion, to make their own houses, to kill their own dinners—it would amount to manslaughter. We Britons, with our arrogant insularity, if we are young and healthy, even if we are well advanced in years and yet sound in muscle and wind, despise ourselves for lounging away a bright summer holiday on the promenades of a fashionable watering place. We must be up and doing; and we sneer supremely at Jules and Alphonse for tripping along in dainty boots, smoking innumerable cigarettes, sipping absinthe and vermouth, flirting and chattering in stifling gas-lit halls and concert rooms at Trouville or Biarritz. We look at their tottering legs, their little delicately-shod feet, their wasp waists, their white bejewelled fingers, their padded chests, and their artificially squared shoulders, and we create odious comparisons with our own stained tweed suits, our thick hob-nailed boots, our bronzed faces and hands, and inwardly thank the gods we are Britons. Not that we have much reason to crow. It is in our nature to rough it, just as it is not in the nature of Jules and Alphonse. We are physically better adapted for it, and we do not feel the want of society and gaiety which is fatal to the spirits of a foreigner. In this lies our eccentricity. Men who live in a constant whirl of frivolity and amusement, to whom the bustle and gaiety of a great capital are necessaries of life, would mope and pine if condemned to solitude, and deprived of their everyday luxuries and comforts. Go to Saigon, Algeria, or Pondicherry, and look at the French colonists there established. Observe how utterly miserable and downcast they are, how under the burning sun and amidst those arid wastes of sand they strive to realise the life of their beautiful bright home land, by turning streets into the semblance of boulevards, and by haunting dim cafés, where they can talk of and pine for their distant France over unlimited dominoes and dice.

With us, there is an irrepressible charm in roughing it, and it may be observed that when young Englishmen make a holiday of any length, they generally contrive to introduce into it the roughing element. Perhaps they spend a fortnight with their volunteer regiment under canvas—cheerfully performing the menial duties of private soldiers, sleeping huddled together in a small tent, eschewing bath and change of linen, putting up with coarse, though healthy food, exposed to all weathers, and acting obediently as if in a serious campaign. Perhaps they go to the backwoods of America, become hunters and trappers, assimilate themselves for the time being with Sioux and Comanches, live a life of hairbreadth adventure for a month or so, then return home and sink quietly into the groove of everyday life. Sometimes they do a month's tramping, with their household gods on their backs, getting over more ground in a week than Jules and Alphonse do in a year; or they will explore unknown seas and rivers in the smallest and frailest of boats.

The greatest charm of "roughing it" consists, we conceive, in the retrospect. Most of us have felt the delicious sensation subsequent to the accomplishment of a stern and difficult task, be it intellectual or physical.

So with "roughing it." After a tremendous climb, or a series of adventures in a canoe or a dangerous river, or a week of hard days and rough nights in the open prairie in the pursuit of dangerous game, it is the acme of enjoyment to sit down quietly, armed with pipe and glass, to pooh-pooh the past perils, to recount the ticklish moments, to enumerate the scrapes and adventures, and to glorify oneself in a conscientious manner.

No one whose lines of life have been cast in tolerably pleasant places would care to be continually roughing it, for the novelty having worn off the rough side, would show itself a little too persistently to be gratifying, but as a recreation, or rather as a temporary divergence from the cut-and-dried grooves of one's existence, "roughing it" is exceedingly pleasant to the minds of most able-bodied, active-minded Englishmen.

"AMY ROBSART"

FROM THE PICTURE BY W. F. YEAMES, A.R.A., EXHIBITED IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY

"Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, being the great favourite of the Queen Elizabeth, it was thought she would have made him her husband; to this end, to free himself of all obstacles, he had his wife, Amy Robsart, conveyed to the solitary house of Cumnor Hall, in Berkshire, inhabited by Anthony Forster, his servant. This same Forster, in compliance with what he well knew to be the Earl's wishes, came with others in the dead of night to the lady's bedchamber, and stifled her in bed, and flung her downstairs, thereby believing the world would have thought it a mischance, and so blinded their villany; and the morning after, with the purpose that others should know of her end, did Forster, on pretence of carrying out some behest of the Countess, bring a servant to the spot where the poor lady's body lay at the foot of the stairs."

Sir Aubrey's "History of Berkshire."

HORN HEAD, IN WEST DONEGAL

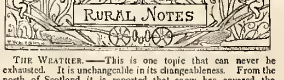
THE north-west of Donegal has always been perhaps the least-known part of the British Isles. Even Arthur Young, who just a hundred years ago was running about from one end of Ireland to another, contented himself with hearsay about this very out-of-the-way corner: "I am informed (says he) that at Horn Head Mr. Stewart has a warren of sand twenty-five miles long." The sand is more plentiful than ever! it has turned Rospenna House into a ruin, it has covered plantations, and buried fishing establishments and curing-houses. Of one of these all now visible is the chimney, rising a few feet above the sandhill just like the tower of St. Enodoc, near Padstow, on the north Cornish coast—down which, by the way, the parson was wont (says report) to creep and read the service to the clerk. Sandhills, miles of them, are not encouraging to the tourist; but there is a great deal besides sandhills. Some of the cliffs at Horn Head are said to have over 700 feet of nearly vertical height—the highest in our islands, save only the huge sea-wall of Corran Achill. The road, too, from the quaint little town of Letterkenny, is as wildly picturesque as any even in the west of Ireland,—we should rather say roads, for the tourist has the choice of three. The ordinary car-way skirts the head of Lough Swilly, and then passes through the long wild gorge called the Gap of Barnesmore—the original Glencoe without its gloomy memories; without a history, in fact, except that in an old castle Rapin, French Protestant, who fought at the Boyne, is said to have written his book on England. Lough Swilly you ought to have seen before you get to Letterkenny. When you are at Derry just run across to Buncrana, on the eastern shore of the lough; and close to that delightful little watering place you will have the Dunaff cliffs 500 feet high, the Innishowen mountains rising to more than 2,000 feet, and such a view of the Donegal Alps (Muckish, Errigal, &c.) as can hardly be matched out of Switzerland. Now Arthur Young aforesaid was an unromantic eighteenth-century man, whose talk was of soils and manures, and rent and the price of labour, and who actually pooh-poohs the Giant's Causeway, saying in the coolest way possible: "It's not very magnificent, though the cliffs are bold; I believe it would have struck me more if I had not seen the prints of Staffa." Yet even he burst into enthusiasm as he sails across the southern end of Lough Swilly: "The scenery amazingly fine; the lands everywhere bold and high, with one of the noblest outlines anywhere to be seen." Arthur Young is right; therefore on your way to Horn Head manage somehow to spend at least a day on Lough Swilly. If you can spend another in exploring Glen Swilly, where, close by Letterkenny the lough ends, and its namesake river forces a way through a wildly picturesque gorge, so much the better. Another route to Horn Head is by Lough Salt, a lonely little lake 800 feet above the sea level at the foot of a mountain, whence is perhaps the grandest and most varied of all the views in the neighbourhood. Both routes are the same as far as Kilmacrevan, a place of old fame, where St. Columbkilla, the warlike "dove of the churches," founded an abbey, and where another was founded by his kinsmen the O'Donnells. There are very few remains of either; but not far off, near Creeslough, they show the stone on which the kings of Tyrconnell used to be enthroned. One can imagine the valley full of O'Donnell clansmen, shouting, cheering, hoisting their chieftain-elect on a chair made by crossing spear-handles; the harpers (for bagpipes were not in those days; where they came from is a mystery) ringing out those stirring airs, one of which is well-known from Scott's words, "pibroch of Donuil-Dhu;" the Brehons, when silence was at last made, reciting the award of the clan; and then the chieftain standing on the big stone, and vowing to rule according to the customs, swearing to that effect on the domnach or psaltair (copies of the Gospels, brought in their relic-box of elaborate metal-work from the great Abbey of Kildonnell). That was the order of the day in peaceful times; but, alas, more often the claim was divided; the son was a minor, and therefore the tanist, or heir, was the late chief's brother; but very probably some other kinsman would come forward, of course for the young lad's sake, and so the Creeslough glen and all the glens round would be stained with kindred blood, and the work of the ever-watchful invaders, who were already joining hands from Derry to Iniskillen, would be forwarded by native weapons.

It is no use going into Donegal without knowing something of the history of the people. Read Montalembert's St. Columba (in the "Moines d'Occident,") for that saint has set his mark on the whole land from Lough Foyle to far Glen Columb Kill. Read Mr. Froude, cum grano; for he can't help being a partisan, and is divided between his sympathy with the poor native and his hatred of chiefs, Brehons, and all those whom the poor native has elected to honour. Above all, read Sir H. S. Maine ("Origin of Institutions") about the Brehon law, and its affinities with our own Common Law; and reflect on this truth that: "If Ireland had been left alone, one tribe would have conquered the rest; and, under a strong active central government, the gap, never very wide, between so-called 'English civilisation' and 'Irish barbarism' would have disappeared." So judges the clear-sighted Sir H. S. Maine; and the conquering tribe, there is very little doubt, would have been the O'Donnells, the men of Donegal. They had not been decimated by the Danes, like the men of the south and centre; they were not split into two factions like the Hy-Nial (O'Neils); they had foreign trade and alliances (in the fifteenth century the O'Donnell is called "king of fish" by the Spaniards, to whom he used to send their Lenten supply). You cannot "do" Donegal properly without knowing something of its history. Your carmen and guides will tell you about "the flight of the earls," when O'Neill and O'Donnell, accused of treason, and hopeless of resisting at home, sailed off to seek help from Spain against James I. and his "planters." They never returned—died broken-hearted, finding Spanish promises sadly innutritious fare; and the landowners are aliens—Stewarts, Boyds, Chichesters—"planters," Scotch and English. But the people are the same still; and in every country, in Ireland most of all, if you would thoroughly enjoy your tour, you must know something of the popular heroes.

At Kilmacrenan, then, the roads to Dunfanaghy,—quaint little town that lies under the shadow of Horn Head, on a shallow sandy inlet of Sheephaven—diverge. You either go through Barnesmore Gap, crossing the Owencarrow River, sighting Castle Doo and Castle Doe, holds of the M'Swines, and passing near Ards, a fine place belonging to one of the Stewarts; or you see Lough Salt and Glenlough, a wide reach of the Owencarrow, and the villages of Glen and Carrickart. This is the way for the angler, to whom the whole district offers what the advertisements call "unrivalled attractions." The wonder is that so many English who go year after year to Gweedore (Lord George Hill's hotel, at the head of the bay of the same name, about half-way between Horn Head and his fellow giant Shiebh League), enjoy the fishing thoroughly, send to the Field a summary of their sport and a few genial remarks on the excellent accommodation, and yet never have the courage to try the splendid fishing country which lies north of a line drawn from Letterkenny to Gweedore. Those who try it once will surely go again. Besides trout and salmon, they may get sunfish along the coast; though the sea-fisheries, also, are not what they were in Arthur Young's day, when Mr. Nisbet of Kilmacredon invented the gun-harpoon, and the whale brought almost as much profit to these coasts as the herring. The terrible decay of fisheries is almost enough to turn even the tourist into a Home Ruler. Young speaks of these fisheries as "a sure nursery of seamen;" were they still flourishing we should not be reduced to scour the streets for Arabs to fill our training ships.

The third route, by Lough Beagh north and south, past Mullangore—one of the very few bits of primeval forest which war and wantonness have left in Ireland, and through Glenbrugh or over one of the passes of the Donegal Alps, is only for the tourist who has time at his command. By making a zigzag, it may be readily combined with the Lough Salt route; or, going by Barnesmore Gap, you may return by Glenbrugh, and through it push on to "the Rosses," and thence to Gweedore. The whole country is worth doing well. Round "the Rosses" gathers a painful interest connected with the famine time; the people died much as they died at more famous Skibbereen; a few good Quakers from England were doing the land-owner's duty—saving all they could; you may still hear some old man say how Marquesa Conyngham's agent persuaded them even to eat up their seed-roots, assuring them of help and fresh seed from his lordship—a help which never came. Close to the Rosses is Gweedore, whose praise is in the sporting newspapers. Thence by Glen Columb Kill, where, besides the saint, they tell of Prince Charles Edward, hidden away for months while men thought he was in the Highlands; and thence by Sliebh League, as "through a country sawed with bogs," as Arthur Young has it, to lovely Killybeg is a tour the like of which, for magnificence and varied beauty, cannot be found within the four seas of the British Empire. The go-ahead traveller can do it all by car, and can pick up real homespun and ribbed stockings at almost every halting place. The man who has time to spare will take his rod, buy a pony (to sell again when he gets round to Ballyshannon), and turn inland whenever guide-book, or, better, a local guide, or his own instinct for the picturesque, tells him there is anything worth seeing.

We could go into raptures, especially about Glenbeagh, and Errigal Mountain (a white cone of dolomite); but it's idle expatiating on what another has not seen. Weather? Well, we had a very dry July there; but all Julys are not dry. June is always our pet month for Western travel; but September is good also. Accommodation? Letterkenny, Dunfarragh, Killybegs, all have good inns, as good as those which even Punch lately praised down at Glengariff. As for Gweedore hotel, it is a wonder, as well as being a credit to all concerned.



RURAL NOTES

THE WEATHER.——This is one topic that can never be exhausted. It is unchangeable in its changeableness. From the north of Scotland it is reported that snow has covered the mountain tops, and that corn in the valleys is green. In the south we have had showery days, but on the whole a favourable time for cutting grain that was late, and for carrying that which was cut. A large proportion still remains out in the north of Scotland, but in the Midland Counties there is now little standing in the fields. The general result of the harvest, so far as can be gathered up to the present time, is that wheat will not yield up to the average mark; but it should be remembered that no cereal produce can be testified to until such time as it has been passed through the threshing mill. It is all very well to pass through counties or countries and take such a passing glance at crops as an express train enables you to do, but decision after such inspection is of comparatively little value. Our own opinion is that this year farmers will have to congratulate themselves upon a middling crop of corn, taking wheat and barley and oats all over, and that they will not have much to complain of about roots. In some localities, no doubt, the weevil injured the peas, and the potato blight has manifested itself in not a few fields. The members of the agricultural interest this year will have comparatively little to complain of—noting the high prices of meat.

THE SHORTHORN FEVER.——This fever has set in with considerable virulence for the season. In our last "Notes" we observed that high prices were likely to be obtained at forthcoming sales. No animal reached the extreme value of 4,300 guineas, secured by Mr. Cochrane, but higher averages have since been made. At the Gaddesby Hall sale (Mr. Cheney's), where Mr. Strafford was the holder of the sand-glass, 2,100 gs. was the highest sum advanced for one animal, the Thirteenth Duchess of Airdrie, out of a very fashionable strain of blood as things run nowadays, and the average of 546*l.* was given for twenty cows or heifers, and 558*l.* for five bulls. There was not much chance for tenant farmers in this lot. Neither was there at the sale of the Sholebrooke herd, which was conducted by Mr. Thornton, where with the highest price at 2,750 gs. for a Grand Duchess, the average for twenty-six cows was over 370*l.*, and for eleven bulls 321*l.* Mr. Loder's lot (Mr. Loder, it will be remembered, was the purchaser of the 4,100 gs. Duchess of Hillhurst at Cochrane's sale, near Windermere) was not so much in request, 60*l.* being the average of his cows, and 38*l.* that of his bulls.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In America everything is done on a big scale. Sometimes there is a good deal of bounce about the bigness; but generally, so far as farming matters are concerned, there is little exaggeration. No one will deny that M'Cormick profited upon the ideas of the Forfarshire minister with regard to the reaping machine, and most English makers of the same contrivance for saving labour in the harvest field will admit that they have benefited by the instructions of our cousins over the "Herring Pond." On the Dalrymple Farm, in the Dacota Territory, an American correspondent tells us there is an acreage of 10,000 acres upon which 4,000 acres of wheat are grown, and in another year the king of cereals is to have 3,000 acres more to himself. Splendid farming, we should think. At the time the letter was dated no fewer than twenty-six self-binding reapers were at work in the field. We have had but little experience of of these machines, but they are the one thing needed to save a considerable amount of expense and anxiety to the farmer. The best one exhibited to our supposed top-booted and broad-brimmed friends is Walter A. Wood's; but that, according to professional judges, requires improvements which will no doubt be effected before next season. The American correspondent states that these self-binders out there "do their work better than it could possibly be done by hand." The wheat crop in Minnesota is estimated to yield 35,000,000 of bushels, and according to a Yankee paper, as this State is not suffering from the ravages of the grasshopper (no remark is made about the Colorado beetle), "the farmers are in buoyant spirits."—Pleuro-pneumonia has occurred on the farm of Sir Francis Goldsmid, at Rendcomb. Three beasts have been slaughtered. Pleuro is a curable disease, as has been proved at Rossie Priory.—How to utilise our sewage is a question that has occupied the attention of learned professors, civic magnates, and practical farmers for a series of years. The fact is that sewage grass, so far as we have experienced, is not dangerous to milk-producing cattle, and the milk therefrom not less nutritive than that derived from other grasses. An interesting and practical view of sewage farming will be found in Dr. Carpenter's Lectures, which have just been published under the editorial care of Mr. Marchmant.—In the agricultural districts there is still much need of light, physically as well as mentally. The long nights of winter are creeping in upon us, and candles in cattle-sheds and stables are highly objectionable. Incendiarism is not so common in the agricultural districts as generally supposed. It arises more from want of care than from design, and ploughmen, not having the appliances of prevention, often in a draught drop a spark which they notice not, and the building is speedily in flames. The Davy lamp was a grand boon to the miner; Rowatt's stable lamp is one of the same character for those who have to groom horses in the night. It saves money and lessens danger.

CHURCH MUSIC IN GERMANY

THE picturesque little town of Biberach in Wurtemburg was aroused from its slumbers during the second week in September by the grand general meeting of the "German Society of St. Cecilia," and the choirs in connection with it.

The Society of St. Cecilia has been in existence a few years, and while Wagner and his admirers have been attempting to reform the music of the opera, and make it more severe, the "Society of St. Cecilia" has been carrying on a reform of the music of the Church, with what success may be gained from the following facts—viz., that the choirs of the Cathedrals of Cologne, Munster, Trêves, Ratisbon, Speyer, Aix-la-Chapelle, Eichstat, Luxembourg, and Rottenburg (in Wurtemburg) have already joined the Society, and adopted its rules. That the Society has three newspapers in Germany and one in America devoted to propagating and expressing its views. That it possesses many thousand members and subscribers, not only in Germany, but also in Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, and America. That the Society has opened schools all over Germany, and a University for the study of Church music at Ratisbon. I need hardly say that the Society has no political bearings, and has been rather encouraged than otherwise by the various German Governments. It may not be uninteresting to some of your readers to hear how this remarkable Society had its commencement, and what are the views which it holds.

Some thirty-five years ago there lived in Ratisbon a certain Dr. Proszke, a very learned man, a Canon of the Cathedral, and a most enthusiastic musician. During his travels he heard the celebrated Sistine Choir, and was so enchanted with the wonderful music of Palestrina that he determined to introduce the study of the compositions of that great master and his school into his native land. He met, however, with very little success, and was looked upon by most people of his time as a kind of harmless lunatic. Proszke, however, was too determined a man to be laughed out of his scheme, and, although he saw little chance of its succeeding during his own lifetime, he determined that those who were to succeed him in the work should not want material to carry it on. He therefore set to work, and collected from every quarter where they were to be picked up original manuscripts and early printed copies of the works of the great composers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Little did those dream who saw this old gentleman poring over some tattered manuscript, and humming to himself a passage here and there which took his fancy, that he was commencing a movement which was destined in a few years to drive Haydn and Mozart out of the choirs of the German cathedrals and churches. Having got together a large collection of his old Church music, Proszke commenced publishing it in a magnificent work entitled "Musica Divina." He lived, however, only to see two volumes published, and some of the beautiful compositions which he loved so much were for the first time in Germany sung over his grave.

As is too often the case, the death of the originator of a movement sometimes gives an impetus to the movement itself, for within a few years of the death of Proszke we find his work being carried out, and his followers becoming so numerous that they formed a complete school of ecclesiastical musicians. The names of Witt, Greith, Mittenleiter, Oberhoffer, and Harnisch are not only well known in Germany, but in most countries in Europe.

The chief views advocated by the Cecilian Society are as follow:—1. That ecclesiastical music is a distinct branch of art to music composed for the stage or the concert-room. 2. That ecclesiastical music must have for its foundation the Gregorian chant and the "vocal" school. 3. That the introduction of the operatic and theatrical style of music into the Church choir has been most disastrous in its results, inasmuch as it has completely annihilated the real Church music, destroyed its individuality, deprived it of its vigour and of all religious sentiment, and left it at best a weak, worthless imitation of the stage. 4. That in order to reform this lamentable state of things, all operatic and theatrical music must be at once and for ever excluded from Church choirs, even though it may be the work of such masters as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, or Schubert. 5. That the too long neglected and despised Gregorian Chant must be brought out from the oblivion into which it had fallen, and carefully and scrupulously studied. 6. That the great works of the pure vocal style of the sixteenth century must be taken as models for the construction of harmonies. Richard Wagner has said that the only hope for Church music is to seek refuge in this purely vocal style. 7. Above all, the works of that great master of polyphonic counterpoint, Palestrina, must be taken as the guide and authority in all matters concerning Church music, for it is considered by the Cecilia Society that under this master Church music reached its highest point of perfection.

It must not be understood that the Society desires entirely to abolish organ and instrumental accompaniments to Church music, but when used they must be kept thoroughly subservient to the vocal portion of the composition, and be of a grave and solemn character.

Of course this movement has met with fierce opposition, even amongst the clergy themselves. It is hardly to be supposed that the substitution of Palestrina in the place so long held by Mozart and Haydn was a pill which German vanity would easily swallow, and nothing but the positive conviction of the absolute necessity of such a step could have induced the leaders of the Society of St. Cecilia to speak out in the bold way which they have done. I think, however, that those who have heard the music of Palestrina, Orland di Lasso, and Cæsar de Zacharais rendered by the choir of Ratisbon Cathedral, or who attend the meetings at Biberach will find nothing to regret in the severe measures taken by the "Society of St. Cecilia for the Reform of Church Music in Germany."

THE READER

PROFESSOR DOWDEN has chosen in "Shakespere" an admirable subject—at once large enough to stand in need of some brief general introduction, yet not too vast for satisfactory outline within the narrow compass of a primer—for the new number of "Literature Primers" (Macmillan and Co.) The reproach so often cast on generations fed on Steevens and Malone, that to understand their Shakespeare they must go to Germany, a newer age has more than wiped away. Shakespeare societies, Shakespeare texts, comparative studies of the England of Shakespeare's day, critical disquisitions on the motifs, sequence, and genuineness of his plays crowd on each other in such close succession that the poet himself seems in some danger of being buried beneath the growing mass of "Shakespeare literature." Through such a maze the youthful student will find Professor Dowden's primer a most efficient guide, whether for its general summary of the extent and results of latest Shakespearian researches, or for its brief but clear analyses of the story of the Shakespeare family, the features of that Elizabethan London in which the youthful bard sought competence and honour, the order of his works as shown by external and internal evidence, contemporary notices or modern comparisons of "light endings" and "unstopped lines," their character purpose and general classification as indicating successive stages of mental and artistic growth, or their interpretation since his death by actors on the stage and editors for the closet, or, last not least, laborious German commentators, from Shakespeare worshipping Gervinus to Rümelin and Benedix, the leaders of the new "anti-Shakespeare-mania" revolt. Altogether just what such a primer ought to be—a clear little digest of facts such as each lover of Shakespeare should have by heart before proceeding to an exhaustive study of his writings.

A homely little volume, "Brazil and the River Plate, 1870-76," by W. Hatfield (Church, Sutton: E. Stanford, London), must be commended rather to readers interested in South American investments than to lovers of exciting tales of travel, and more even to these first for its supplement on the events of the last year or two than for the somewhat commonplace diary of a tour in 1870, which forms its central portion. Disastrous indeed—save in monarchical coffee-growing Brazil—has been the change from the sanguine expectations and inflated trade of the earlier half of the period here described to the blank collapse, hardly quite understood even by old residents in the Riverine States, of 1874-76, and it may be comforting to many to learn that Mr. Hatfield, like many other old Argentines, is of opinion that the collapse, except perchance in lawless Uruguay, can only be for a time—the owners of estancias, the true backbone of the country, being quite unharmed save for the temporary depreciation of their produce, the railways continuing to do fair trade, horses, sheep, and cattle to increase and multiply, and revenue already showing a considerable recovery from the lowest point of the late crisis. The appendices on railway extension in Brazil and the Plate, on the show made by either State at the Philadelphia Exhibition, and on the future of the Amazon Valley, contain much interesting matter.

Not without interest again in its way for the statistician who delights to grapple with page on page of estimates and figures is the fourteenth "Annual Report of the Home and Foreign Trade of Canada and the Commerce of Montreal." by W. J. Patterson (Lovell Publishing Company, Montreal), with its full accounts of those great items of Canadian export—lumber, fish, breadstuffs, cheese, and butter; its sanguine estimates of the future of the Nova Scotia coal trade; and its passing notes of the fiscal and other obstacles which impede the development of many lesser industries. Its great feature, however, is the enormous map illustrative of the superiority in respect of length and levels of the intended Canadian Pacific Railway over the existing U.S. Central Pacific line, and of the advantage of Montreal as the objective point in which converge the shortest air-lines that can be drawn on a globe between Great Britain and Japan, or between Britain and the larger half of the Western section of the United States. The map is a useful one, and will be displayed in next year's Paris Exhibition. We are not, however, quite sure that its framer has made all due allowance for the difficulties of the St. Lawrence navigation, and for the closing of Montreal by ice for a third at least of every year.

The "Geological Survey of Victoria" (No. IV., J. Ferres, Melbourne; G. Robertson: Trübner and Co.: London), acquires each year additional importance as the gradual exhaustion of alluvial gold-workings leads more and more to the development of deep quartz mining—an enterprise wholly dependent for success on scientific knowledge of auriferous and non-auriferous strata, probable "strike" and "dip" of quartz reefs, and so forth. In the present number, besides the usual "Report of Progress," are several special reports of last year's survey and prospecting operations—in conformity with the vote of 10,000*l.*—in North and South Gipps Land, on the upper Yarra and about Cape Otway, in which though no payable gold-field was actually discovered, much valuable information has been collected, not only of the existence of gold in new directions, but of the general geological and topographic features of large, almost unexplored, districts of the colony. The maps, plans, and views that accompany the reports are well and even tastefully executed.

We are not quite sure that there is not more of mere quaintness of phrase and fancy than of genuine beauty in "A Pocket of Pebbles" (Macmillan and Co.), as a Sussex vicar not inaptly designates a string of thoughts in prose or verse—aphorisms interspersed with occasional sonnet and distich—on many spiritual and social problems, such as might well be put together, like agates from the beach, in meditative rambles by the Channel sea. But they are decidedly the thoughts of a man of much culture and of a penetrating, somewhat original, turn of mind, of a preacher earnest, too, though without severity, unless it be for the one great error, as he esteems it, of our day, the only one indeed to which he returns again and again in these his aphorisms, the "godless education" advocated by the Birmingham doctrinaires. A volume, if not of the highest order, fairly above above the average level of modern maxim-mongers and essayists.

Above, for instance, the "Occasional Lectures, Political, Social, and Religious" (Charing Cross Publishing Company), which Mr. J. S. Tomkins, Citizen and Loriner, thinks fit to offer to a not too grateful world—lectures well fitted and even meritorious in their original form as papers read before small literary societies—but hardly calling for more extensive circulation. To do Mr. Tomkins justice, however, he takes some pains to get up his facts—on Church matters more especially.

Works on Natural History are often of too technical a character to attract young people; but Dr. A. Wilson, in his "Sketches of Animal Life and Habits" (W. and R. Chambers), has successfully endeavoured to arouse genuine interest while conveying sound and useful information. Here are collected together sketches of the tiny beings which inhabit the deep sea, of fossils of various fishes, chats about sea-anemones and molluscs, characteristics of familiar and unfamiliar animals—a series of articles in an easy and familiar strain, which will certainly make the reader eager to know more about the subjects so pleasantly skimmed by the author. For seaside and country rambles the volume will be a precious companion, as the young naturalist might easily attempt a little amateur dissection, and supplement Dr. Wilson's clear descriptions and illustrations by personal observation. Some of the sketches have already appeared in Chambers's Journal.—Anxious to prevent the thoughtless cruelty often practised by children on animals, Messrs. Chambers have published a collection of anecdotes, "Kindness to Animals," illustrating the sagacity, fidelity, and general good qualities of dumb creatures. Most of the stories are familiar, but will be very interesting to children.

Of the "Court of Divorce in Golden Land" (Remington and Co.), enough to say that it is one of the simplest of possible allegories, in which the future verdict of History in the reign of Queen Victoria may be found as it would be given by that extreme Church party, which interprets in the strictest spirit the New Testament sayings about the marriage of the divorced.

"Evening and Morning" (J. Spiers) is one of those provoking little books in which a slender thread of fiction is made the vehicle of the doctrine of a sect. Briefly, the plot is the conversion of an avowed sceptic to revealed religion in the form of Swedenborgianism. The dialogue is occasionally pleasing—the story, as fiction, simply worthless.

A second edition, after the lapse of ten years, of the Rev. John Cooper's "Science of the Spiritual Life" (S. Low and Co.) will be well received by plain folk weary of agnostic, materialist and pantheistic speculations, and glad to welcome good sound arguments in proof of "the adaptation of Christianity to the nature and condition of man" on the basis of those phenomena of religious consciousness which no philosopher yet in any period of the world's history has been able to get rid of or to ignore. The chapters on "The Duty and Rationale of Prayer" and on "Combination or Causation," including the vexed question of miracles, may be quoted as specially worth reading in the present condition of religious thought.

We have also to acknowledge "The Doctrines of Everlasting Torment Shown to be Unscriptural" (S. Tinsley), a pamphlet chiefly interesting for its detailed examination of the uses of the words "æon" and "æonal," both in the New Testament and in Philo and Josephus; and "Individual Liberty," by G. Vasey (J. Burns, Southampton Buildings), an attempted refutation of the political fallacies in the late J. S. Mill's essay on "Liberty," more particularly with reference to his disapproval of legislative interference with the traffic in intoxicating drinks.

"Reports of the Charity Organisation Society for 1876" strike us as still a little "hard." No doubt the Society does excellent work, in the detection of imposition most of all. But we could wish its charity, especially in what it calls "Parish cases," were not such an evident calculation whether it would be cheaper to assist an applicant, or to send him to the Union.

We have also to acknowledge a seventh edition of the "Law of Husband and Wife, with Remarks on the 'Married Woman's Property Act' of 1874" (E. W. Allen), from the unprotected husband's point of view; and a thirteenth thousand of Mr. J. W. Smith's useful handy-book of the "Law of Master and Servant" (Effingham Wilson).

PUNCH AND JUDY SHOW REFORM

AT a recent meeting of a Board of Guardians of a parish that need not be here mentioned, a discussion arose relative to a proposed entertainment to be given to the workhouse children. Amongst other delightful features the good-natured compiler of the programme had included a Punch and July. This, however, was at once sternly objected to by a gentleman of the Board. Not on the score of extravagance. It could not be called an expensive feature. Taking into consideration the exceptional circumstance, and perhaps generously bearing in mind the probability that if they set too high a value on their services the poor little paupers would go Punchless, Messrs. Codlin and Short had agreed to do the job for twelve shillings. But the objection of the worthy Guardian rested not on financial but on moral grounds. In his opinion there was that in a Punch and Judy exhibition calculated to deprave the mind of the child who witnessed it. He had long kept an eye on Punch, and the conclusion at which he had arrived was that, make the best of him, he was a brutal ruffian armed with a bludgeon, who took a savage delight in maltreating every one who came within his reach. Surely his brother-officers could not recommend a Punch and Judy show as a proper spectacle to set before the young over whom they were guardians, in the face of the fact that one of its most prominent characters to be abused and ill-used was a beadle! Again, he had no hesitation in asserting that the show was objectionable, and ought to be put down rather than encouraged, could nothing worse be said against it than that it involved cruelty to animals. It might not be generally known that the supposed intelligence of the dog Toby was a delusion. The creature's apparent sagacity originated in torture. He had made inquiries of those who were in a position to know, and he had been assured that the barking and snapping of the dog at the proper moment was due to the pinching of his tail by the man concealed within the theatre. Beaten on his motion that Punch and July be struck out, the worthy Guardian made a stout fight of it with several amendments, and finally achieved a partial victory by causing it to be seconded and carried that in the forthcoming exhibition the showmen should be instructed to leave out the beadle.

There may be not much—nothing certainly that is novel—in the circumstance of a commanding officer in the Camp of Bumbledom making himself ridiculous. The matter, however, assumes a somewhat serious aspect, if the objection of the parochial magnate may be regarded as even a remote indication of popular opinion, that poor old Mr. Punch is, to put it mildly, too recklessly energetic in his behaviour, and too coarse in his style for the improved age he has lived to see. That he stands as high in favour as ever there can be no question. If any one doubts it he has only to observe the crowd that so rapidly gathers about the tiny theatre within a few minutes of a "pitch" being made. Not only does Punch stand well with the people, he has friends in high places. Magistrates and aldermen from the judicial bench have a kindly word to say for him—nay, in the House of Commons itself great M.P.'s have not felt ashamed to confess that they can still enjoy a hearty laugh at the practical joking of the hunchbacked puppet with the cap and bells. Did occasion ever arise, he would not be lost for lack of influential advocates. At the same time it might be well to consider whether a little wholesome reform in Mr. Punch's theatricals would not tend to a prolongation of his amusing existence, and if so, whether the same might not be attempted. No one for a moment will dispute that he is one of the most jovial of despots. Not only is he able to smile while he murders, but he chuckles over each succeeding atrocity so hilariously that he may be heard at the length of a street, and with a heartiness that must convince the most sceptical that he is not in the least actuated by blood-thirstiness and malice, but does it all for the pure fun of the thing. At the same time it must be admitted that he does lay about him in a manner that is the reverse of merciful. There is scarcely a subordinate that he has not only beaten hard, but by the same means brought to a high state of polish the heads of the tin tacks that once held the wigs on. It is asserted by the learned that he comes of a pagan line of ancestry, and certainly his habits and manners justify the presumption. That he has no respect for the wife of his bosom is certain, inasmuch as it is her unprovoked and barbarous murder, by being knocked on the head with the bludgeon, that furnishes material for the entire drama, or tragedy, rather. He makes short work of the undertaker who comes to bury his wife, of the beadle and the policeman who come to arrest him, of the coroner, of the ghost of the departed that comes with death's-head and shroud to terrify him, of the Unmentionable from the bottomless pit himself when he arrives, horns, tail, and pitchfork all complete, so that in the end there is quite a heap of dead bodies on the board for Mr. Punch to gloat over.

This, of course, is all very funny, the life-taking being all of such a purely pantomimic sort that the most nervous child will not feel frightened at witnessing it. But the question is, or, perhaps it will be better to say, the question will be, when our Board schools have wrought the wondrous change they have so well began, cannot Mr. Punch do better things? He is a social influence by no means to be despised. The children believe in him, and will run a mile at any time to see what he has to show them. Why then should he not discontinue the brutal old head-breaking business, and place on his tiny stage performances which may still be mirth-provoking, but at the same time neither coarse nor ruffianly? There are scores of nursery stories with which the juveniles of the kingdom are quite familiar, and which might, no doubt, handled with the cleverness and tact that Mr. Punch's proprietors are known to possess, be placed on the mimic boards effectively and profitably. Punch himself need not be banished—goodness forbid that he should be. The suggestion is that his well-appreciated talent and his genial influence amongst the juvenile population might be more rationally utilised.

MISCELLANIES.—There are some misguided enthusiasts in the world whose motto is, or appears to be, "Whatever is, is wrong." With the idea of putting everybody and everything right, these well-meaning individuals tilt at some of our most experienced and clever composers, whose names are well-known in musical circles—J. Stainer, Mus. Doc., Berthold Tours, W. H. Monk, J. W. Jordan, and W. S. Stoyle, for example. Under the title of "Series for the Diffusion of Truthful and Natural Science in Music" (Educational Series) will be found much to puzzle and bewilder the ordinary reader. Those who care to search for the meaning thereof may procure this elaborate work at 28A, Paternoster Row.—From the same anonymous publisher comes a pamphlet, entitled "The Choirman's Dream; or, the Vision of Will Crouch," who evidently suffered from a nightmare of Tallis, Byrd, and Marbeck on the brain.—At the present bellicose season we are sure to be overwhelmed with songs for the period. "War's Alarms" is a neatly written song by H. Adams and E. Jonghmanns (F. G. White).—"A Cavalier War Song," by T. A. Willis, may be sung anywhere by the owner of a medium voice from D below the lines to the octave above (Messrs. W. G. Hallifax and Co.).—From the "Alliance Musicale" come "Three Voluntaries" upon the ancient Italian hymn "O Sanctissima," arranged by Carli Zoeller and R. Lange, for the organ, two violins—cello and bass—two flutes, two clarionets, two trombones, two oboes, and drum; a small but compact orchestral arrangement for an amateur band. Carli Zoeller has also arranged with much taste Schubert's beautiful serenade, "Weary Flowers their Buds are Closing" as a solo for the flute, with pianoforte and orchestral accompaniment.—From the same composer come "Six Studies and Eight Cadenzas," for the violin only—excellent practice for that instrument—and a "Romanza" for the horn, with a pianoforte accompaniment.—(Messrs. J. R. Lafleur and Son).—"Four Hymns Set to Music," by J. Danvers Power, will doubtless give satisfaction to his mother (to whom they are dedicated) and to other members of his family circle, but we doubt if the general public will prefer the new to the old settings of these four well-known hymns (Messrs. Weekes and Co.).—Although a "new national song" entitled "England's England Still," words by the late J. A. Conroy, Esq., music by P. S. Conroy, is not likely to displace our present National Anthem, yet there is much to praise in this composition, both as regards words and music; the former breathe a strong spirit of loyalty, and the latter is nervous and vigorous (Messrs. Turner and Sons, Manchester).—A remarkably pretty poem by Isa Craig Knox, entitled "The Rainbow's Secret," has been skilfully set to music by H. C. Hemy (Messrs. Metzler and Co.).—Any pianiste in search of a showy piece will find it in a "Grande Fantasie de Concert" called "Maritana," by Carlo Tiesset (Messrs. Hutchings and Romer).—"The Fairy Glen Waltzes," by A. F. Delmar, are very fair specimens of their kind, although they are not super-original in their melodies (Messrs. Weekes and Co.).—Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co. have published a thoroughly well got-up and excellent edition of Joseph, Professor Macfarren's new oratorio, which was produced with such success at the Leeds Festival. The pianoforte accompaniment is by F. W. Davenport. The work is published at such a reasonable price as to place it within the reach of all musical amateurs.

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——A lull has succeeded the vigorous fighting of the past few weeks. Round Plevna there is little change in the situation; Suleiman Pasha still lurks obstinately in the Balkans, and the main activity of the campaign is concentrated on the Lom, where Mehemet Ali and the Czarevitch have had another trial of skill preliminary to that great battle which has been daily expected since the Russians retired from the Kara Lom three weeks ago. The rumours of mediation have partially subsided, reinforcements still pour in to both armies, and on each side preparations continue for a winter campaign. Thus iron huts are to be built for the Russians round Bucharest, barracks established at Sistova, and a fresh railway will be made through Roumania, while steam ice boats will endeavour to keep the Danube open. The Czar will probably quit the field before long at the earnest entreaty of the Empress, who is said to intend visiting Roumania to induce her husband to return with her to Livadia or Kieff. Should the Czar consent he will issue a manifesto. His Majesty is reported to be much depressed, and his gloom is shared by the Grand Duke Nicholas. The Russian army is greatly discouraged, and round Plevna much discontent prevails, as the soldiers have lost confidence in their chiefs, and all the officers consider success hopeless until the general staff is changed. Nevertheless, while acknowledging their defeats to be in a great measure their own fault, they steadfastly maintain their determination to fight to the bitter end.

To revert to Mehemet Ali. The Russians on the Banicka Lom occupied the heights round the villages of Cerkovna and Verboca, about sixteen miles south-east of Biela, and thus threatened Mehemet Ali's left flank. Accordingly on Friday the Egyptian forces, under Prince Hassan, attacked General Tatischeff, and carried Verboca, which they kept gallantly for some time, but were ultimately compelled to retire for want of support. Since then wet weather has set in, and, as the rain in Bulgaria generally continues for ten days or a fortnight at the equinox, operations will probably be suspended. This delay will give time for fresh troops to reach the Czarevitch at Biela, who will thus have a force of 110,000 men and 400 guns.

The blockade and bombardment of Plevna continue, but no further attack has been made by the Russians, who state that they intend to attempt a fresh assault directly the Imperial Guard arrives. Meanwhile they are keeping up a brisk fire to reduce the Turkish fortifications, and are approaching the second redoubt near Gravitza by means of trenches, while on Friday they repulsed an attempt by Osman Pasha to retake the great Gravitza redoubt. Osman has been relieved by a convoy of ammunition and provisions under Chefket Pasha, and the first division—twenty battalions of infantry with cavalry and artillery—entered Plevna on Sunday. On his way from Sofia Chefket had a skirmish near Raschitza on Thursday, and a sharp engagement with Colonel Totalmicoff at Temin on Friday, both ending in favour of the Turks. It is reported that there are 14,000 Turkish wounded in Plevna. There has been terrible suffering amongst the Russian wounded, as the medical staff was unequal to the emergency, and the Roumanian surgical arrangements were a dead failure, while many of the wounded had to wait full two days before their hurts could be attended to. Indeed, according to a correspondent of the Daily News, dread of suffering when wounded, either from Turkish brutality or the inattention of the surgeons, has seriously impaired the courage of the soldiers. The Roumanians have been fired upon whilst burying their dead under a flag of truce, and the Foreign Minister complains that Osman Pasha sends out a corps of Bashi-Bazouks, furnished with axes to despatch the wounded. The Turkish Foreign Minister, however, has issued a fresh protest against Russian cruelties.

There is little news from the Shipka Pass, where Suleiman continues the bombardment, and a small reconnoitring expedition towards Gabrova was made on Saturday. The Turkish attack on Fort St. Nicholas appears to have been a mad project, as the position was on a precipitous rock, and was only gained by surprise during the night. In ASIA the Russians are suffering from want of provisions, as the crops have failed in the plain of Erivan. Large forces are gathering at Erivan, Alexandropol, and Ackaljak, ready for a winter campaign, while Ismail Pasha is said to be forcing General Tergukassoff back upon Erivan. Ismail's troops were repulsed in a small engagement at Chalfalue and Werchynd-Tschamchitschi, there was a small cannonade of the Russians at Mukhoistale on Friday, and the Turkish monitors have bombarded the forts on the coast near Nicolajeffski, and General Melikoff's army at Alexandropol will shortly resume the offensive. The Turkish fleet in the Black Sea have been bombarding Chevketil, near Poti. In MONTENEGRO Prince Nikita continues his victorious campaign, and is now master of the Duga Pass, which gives access to his territory. The Turks, however, are concentrating in the neighbourhood for a decided resistance. SERVIA is still in a vacillating frame of mind, and is said to have received a remonstrance from Russia respecting her delay in taking the field. Besides this reminder to Prince Milan the Czar is reported to have appealed to the King of GREECE for assistance. The Greeks are certainly in a very unsettled condition, as their new Ministry is not yet organised, and they are very wroth with England for supporting the Turkish Note anent Greek armaments. There is great distress in ROUMANIA at the losses of the army, one-fourth of the forces having been killed or wounded. Nevertheless the Foreign Minister is appealing for subscriptions to buy arms for the new levies, while to raise the spirits of the people the guns taken at Gravitza have been paraded through Bucharest. Roumanian territory has been entered by the Turks, who have crossed from Silistria, and are fortifying the bridge from that fortress to the island of Salgam.

FRANCE.——The manifesto of M. Thiers to his electors has been published just as its author left it, the first part having been revised by the ex-President, while the end was awaiting the finishing touches which were to have been given on the day he died. It is a lengthy document, temperate in tone, and remarkable for that lucidity and careful and dignified reasoning characteristic of the late statesman's productions, contrasting vividly with the imperious and somewhat contradictory addresses of the Marshal. Retracing the history of the Third Republic M. Thiers highly applauds the conduct of the late Chamber, which notwithstanding its difficult position preserved a moderate attitude and "deserved well of its country." The Chamber has been accused of being Radical—a word introduced to supplant the expressions Socialist and Communistic—but how could it be Radical when it supported every Moderate measure? In 1873 Monarchy in the face of three competitors was impossible; the Republic was difficult, but possible with prudence and wisdom, and as M. Thiers was declared an obstacle in the way of a settled Government, he retired. The Republic has been called bad, he continues, but it has only been "bad" since May 16th, when it has been administered by an anti-Republican personnel, who, instead of loyally supporting the Government under which they hold office, be that Government what it may, have hampered and disgraced it. To wait for a Monarchical Government means depression in industry and civil war, while the Republic will bring peace, and the Republican programme he sums up as "national sovereignty, liberty, scrupulous legality, liberty of worship, peace." Influential as this manifesto would have been had its author lived, it has created a more profound impression as a message from the dead, and although the sentiments may be too moderate for many Liberals, the Republicans have accepted it with the unanimity and good sense they have shown throughout. The placarding and colportage of the address in the provinces has been forbidden, while the Marshal is carefully disseminating his own proclamation, and has even had it translated into various patois for better appreciation. The criticisms on the latter document have been remarkably sharp, especially an article in the Débats, and the Republican Deputies have published a reply arriving at an exactly contrary conclusion to the Marshal. In their turn the Senators of the Right come forward with a most abusive address, accusing Radicalism of every possible crime.

The next fortnight will be a period of serious agitation for France. The elections take place on the 14th prox., the second ballot will be held on the 28th, and the Senate and Chamber will meet on Nov. 7th. The Councils General will be elected on Nov. 4, and M. de Fourtou is in some alarm lest the election of a Republican Chamber should influence them. The Government is straining every nerve to obtain victory either by fair or foul means, and the Minister of Justice has sent a circular to the Procureurs Généraux, bidding them exercise watchfulness over the proceedings of the electors, and not allow candidates "to have recourse to violence, menaces, or falsehoods to disturb the consciences of the electors, and impair the sincerity of their votes." In Paris the Republicans are pretty sure of success, save in one or two arrondissements, but the Government may be more fortunate in the provinces, where the electors are more easily subdued. M. Grévy has accepted the candidacy for the ninth arrondissement in Paris, formerly held by M. Thiers, and the first public electoral meeting was held on Tuesday. Perfect quiet, however, prevails, and as yet few electoral addresses are placarded, the most important being from M. de Marcère, late Minister of the Interior, who does not spare his former master. The Left of the Senate will bring out their manifesto a few days before the elections. M. Dupanloup has issued a pastoral, entreating his flock to avoid abstention, as, had all the electors voted last time, the Republicans would have been beaten.

M. Gambetta's trial came on last Saturday, when after an eloquent oration from his counsel, M. Allou, the Court confirmed the previous sentence. M. Gambetta reserved his speech, and merely remarked on the incompetency of the tribunal. The case will now be carried into the Courts of Appeal and Cassation, and by the aid of all legal delays cannot be finally settled until November 22nd, when the fate of the Republican party will be decided. The unlucky Bien Public published a report of the trial, and was immediately seized.

Paris has been mourning the death of M. Le Verrier, the famous astronomer and Director of the Observatory, who died at the age of 67, and was buried on Tuesday with great ceremony.

GERMANY.——The relations between Germany and Italy are being drawn closer, and Prince Bismarck has received Signor Crispi, the President of the Italian Chamber, to consult, according to report, on the subject of the next Conclave. Signor Crispi has also been fêted by the members of the Reichstag and Prussian Diet, who gave him a grand banquet.

ITALY.——The Pope duly held a Consistory last week, and named Cardinal Pecci, Bishop of Perugia, Camerlengo instead of Cardinal Panebianco, as had been expected, thus giving the latter a chance of being Pope. The office of Camerlengo is of great importance, as that functionary has to ascertain and proclaim the Pope's death, assume the Papal power during the vacancy, and direct the procedure of the Conclave. His Holiness created fifteen Bishops and a Cardinal, but did not read the Allocution, which was handed to the Cardinals in writing. He continues very weak, and did not receive the usual number of persons on the seventh anniversary of the Italian entry into Rome, which was kept last week very quietly, the only ceremonies being a Republican procession, headed by Menotti Garibaldi, to the breach in the Porta Pia, to replace the memorial wreaths of the fallen combatants, and an illumination of the Corso. The Pope gave audience to a deputation of Italian physicians on Tuesday, and warned them against materialism. He has received a communication from the Italian Government, assuring him that the next Papal election shall be held with perfect freedom, but stating that the Conclave must strictly observe the old-established forms. The policy of the Government and the Vatican on the Eastern Question is by no means unanimous, and the latter watches the growing friendship with Germany with great disgust.

UNITED STATES.——Fresh reports of bribery and corruption come from across the Atlantic. The notorious William Tweed has confessed that he secured the passage of the Erie Classification Bill through the New York Legislature by bribery at the instance of Mr. Jay Gould, who will possibly be prosecuted for his misconduct. In Philadelphia Mr. Morton, late President of the Centennial Exhibition, and head of the Market Street Railway, has for some years, in conjunction with other officials, over-issued the shares as collateral security for loans, the over-issues exceeding the capital. There is a default of 200,000*l.*—President Hayes continues his southern tour, and has been warmly received in Kentucky and Tennessee and the south-east of Alabama, the Governor of Tennessee welcoming him as the giver of peace to the South, and the restorer of union.—There has been a great fire at the Patent Office in Washington, where from 50,000 to 75,000 valuable models were destroyed. The department of the Secretary of the Interior also suffered, and although numerous documents were saved, they were in so confused a state as to seriously impede public business.—Chattanooga in Alabama has been flooded, and the entire cotton crop destroyed, to the number of 30,000 bales.—News of the whaling fleet abandoned last year in Behring Straits has been received, and it appears that only two of the seventy men left on board have reached Point Barrow.

INDIA.——The efforts to subdue the famine are at length proving successful, and cheering accounts come from Madras. Plenteous rain has fallen, agricultural work is active, and the crops are promising, while many natives on the relief works have already gone home, the number on the camps in the town of Madras having declined to 5,000 from 14,000. The difference is not so noticeable up country, as the people are in so reduced a condition as not to be able to work. Still the natives, in their present weak condition, will be greatly injured by the effects of rain and cold. Prospects are also improved in Mysore, although recovery cannot be hoped for before the spring, and the system established by the Viceroy has been so successful that the inmates of the Bangalore relief kitchens have diminished more than one-half. The Supreme and Madras Governments now work excellently together. In Burmah affairs are serious. The inundations have been severe, rice has been exported so largely that the Rangoon poor are starving, and cholera has appeared.

MISCELLANEOUS.——A fire at Marchissey, near Lausanne in SWITZERLAND, has destroyed twenty-two houses.—In EGYPT the Convention with England for the transfer of the British Post Offices at Suez and Alexandria to the Egyptian Government will shortly be signed, and Colonel Gordon has quelled the insurrection at Darfur.—From the CAPE we hear that all is quiet in the Trans-Kei district, and that affairs were settled amicably by the authorities.—In JAPAN the Satsuma insurrection has been quelled, and the leaders have committed suicide.

THE COURT

THE Queen remains at Balmoral, with the Princess Beatrice and the Duke of Connaught. Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice visited Braemar on Saturday for the first time during their present stay, and drove through the village to Quoich, where they had tea. The Queen then called on Mrs. Clark at Allen Quoich, and walked to the Falls, afterwards driving home to Balmoral. Mr. Cross joined the Royal party at dinner. On Sunday Her Majesty, with the Princess Beatrice and the Duke of Connaught, attended service at Crathie Church, the Rev. J. Barclay, of Greenock, officiating. Next evening, Mr. Cross dined with the Queen. Her Majesty has also driven to Birkhall, and has received Sir T. M. and Lady Biddulph at dinner. The Duke of Connaught has been out deerstalking nearly every day, and has also been riding with the Princess Beatrice.

The Prince and Princess of Wales returned to London at the end of last week, the Princess and her children coming up from Cowes, and the Prince arriving on Saturday from his visit to Sir George Wombwell. Before leaving Yorkshire the Prince went to Duncombe Park to see the Earl and Countess of Feversham, where he planted a silver fir on the garden terrace in memory of his visit, inspected the Earl's shorthorns at Griff Farm, and joined in an excursion to the ruins of Rivaulx Abbey, the whole party having tea in the temple on the terrace. The Prince returned to Newburgh Park in the evening, and next morning left for London. On Saturday evening the Prince and Princess went to the Olympic Theatre, and on Monday they were at the Opera Comique. On Tuesday evening, accompanied by the Royal children, they left London for Abergeldie, where they arrived on Wednesday morning. The Prince will probably visit Eastwell Park during the shooting season.

The Duke of Edinburgh has left the British fleet in Besika Bay, as, according to The Times, his longer stay in the East is not considered desirable, and his period of sea service has qualified him for promotion to flag rank. The Duke will meet the Duchess and his children at Marseilles, and go to Malta for the winter, returning to England in April or May, to Eastwell Park.—The Princess Louise visited Carlisle on Saturday, when she opened a Bazaar at the School of Art, and presented prizes to the students. The Princess contributed a terra-cotta statue of Robin Hood, executed by herself, and representing the outlaw, arrow in hand, leaning on the stump of a tree, apparently looking into the forest. After seeing the cathedral, the Princess and the Marquis of Lorne returned to Isell Hall, where they remained until Monday and then went to stay with Lord and Lady Muncaster at Muncaster Castle.—The Duke of Connaught goes to Taymouth Castle to-day (Saturday), on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Breadalbane.—Prince Leopold has been staying with Sir Coutts and Lady Lindsay at Balcarres, and on Sunday was to have accompanied his host and hostess to the Episcopal Church at Pittenweem, but went instead to the parish church of Kilconquhar at the Queen's request. On Tuesday he left for Mount Mount Melville on a visit to Mr. J. Whyte Melville, and on Wednesday he was present at the annual meeting of the St. Andrew's Golf Club.

CHURCH NEWS

THE COMING CHURCH CONGRESS.——Archdeacon Denison has declined an invitation to be present at the Congress which is shortly to be held at Croydon, under the presidency of the Primate. He says "I have seen too much of Church Congresses to have any lingering wish for their continuance. At the Croydon Congress, under the circumstances of the time, it is hardly possible that the Catholic and the Protestant elements should not come into very pronounced collision. Now, if anything could come of such collision which would be of an authoritative character, it would be a duty to be present. But nothing can come of it of an authoritative character, and a great deal must come of it which had much better not have come at all, in the face of the common enemy, infidelity, or what is, in its substance, the same thing, indifferentism. I have been present at every Church Congress except two, or at most three, when I was disabled by illness or its effects, and have now taken my final leave of them. I regret that they have a history, and hope it may be speedily closed, and, as far as possible, forgotten."

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.——The Annual Conference of the Alliance was opened on Tuesday at Oxford. There was a large attendance of residents of Oxford, clergy and citizens, and delegates from almost every country in Europe. Sir Harry Verney, the president, in opening the proceedings, said England had to deal with all faiths and all nationalities, and they gladly embraced the opportunity of hearing the views of their friends from other countries. An address of welcome was delivered and responded to. On Wednesday the Conference again met, the Rev. J. R. Campbell, of Bradford, delivering the annual address, the subject of which was, "The Aspect of the Present Times a Reason for Christian Unity." In the evening two addresses were delivered, one by the Dean of Canterbury, on "Protestantism in Relation to Social Progress and Religious Liberty;" and the other by the Rev. Dr. Morley Punshon, on "Oxford under Two Queens," in which the times of Queen Mary and those of Queen Victoria were contrasted.

VARIOUS.——Dr. Vaughan, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Salford, on Sunday issued a pastoral calling upon the congregations in his diocese to join in the efforts now being made to relieve the sufferers by the famine in India. He also called this attention to "the miserable moral condition, every year becoming worse, of the civilised world," which, he argues, is "exhibiting in glaring colours the result of its apostacy from Christianity."—The Post says that a number of Ursuline nuns banished from Germany, under the Falk Laws, have founded a convent at Greenwich. They come from Duderstadt, in Hanover, where they have been established for about 200 years, and they belong to the original and oldest branch or congregation of Ursulines, that of Paris, founded in 1612.—A correspondent of the Rock has made the extraordinary discovery that Mr. Gladstone is the Beast, or one of the Beasts, mentioned in the Apocalypse, or in other words, that his name in Greek makes up the number 666. The Rock, however, though it highly respects its correspondent, and confesses that it is not partial to Mr. Gladstone, declines to accept the theory to which it has given currency, on the just ground that the last letter of Mr. Gladstone's name must be reckoned not as the Greek long e, which stood for eight, but as the short e, which stood only for five, and that therefore Mr. Gladstone falls short of the Beast's number by three, which is sufficient to exculpate him; although, says the Rock, "he only escapes by the skin of his teeth."

MUSIC

THE LEEDS FESTIVAL.——The Leeds Musical Festival of 1877 will be remembered especially for two things—the magnificent choral singing, and the production of a new oratorio by the greatest living English musician. In Joseph Professor G. A. Macfarren has enriched the art with a masterpiece. His John the Baptist, written for the Bristol Festival of 1873, was fine, his Resurrection was still finer, his Joseph is finest of all. The leading features in the programme of this Yorkshire gathering of art-lovers were dwelt upon last week, and it is only requisite now to add that the First Walpurgis Night of Mendelssohn, Handel's magnificent Solomon, now fast attaining the popularity which should have attended it from the beginning (130 years ago), the glorious "Magnificat" of John Sebastian Bach, the "Requiem" of Mozart, to eulogise which would be superfluous, and Beethoven's Christus am Œlberg, known among us as the Mount of Olives, and generally ignored by musicians and cultivated amateurs under its Exeter Hall nickname of Engedi, successfully went to establish the absolute supremacy of the Yorkshire musicians over any other combined body of vocalists whose business it is to deal with oratorios and other choral works belonging to the same sphere of art-production. By far the most difficult task assigned to our Yorkshire enthusiasts—for enthusiasts they are, in the fullest acceptation of the term—was Joseph, the oratorio composed by Professor Macfarren expressly for Leeds, and received with such unanimous acclamations of approval as only follow a legitimately won triumph. With the works previously mentioned they were more or less familiarised by incessant study under such admirable choral instructors as Mr. Broughton and Mr. Burton—we do not say precisely with a view to the Festival, but in their general practice all the year round, for their own delight, and, let it be added, their own moral and physical improvement. It is an agreeable topic upon which to dwell, that these Northern amateurs, men and women, give up so much of their time to Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Mendelssohn, that might otherwise be devoted to amusements more frivolous than edifying. When, on the other hand, they are brought face to face with something wholly strange to them they seem, "like giants refreshed," to be endowed with renewed vigour, and go at their task as though it were the first ever submitted to them. In 1874, Professor Macfarren gave them enough to do with his John the Baptist, and this time the Cambridge Musical Professor taxed their persevering energy, intelligence, and ambition to excel, still more severely, and the complete success with which they passed through the ordeal is to their credit in proportion. The result was a genuine triumph. The oratorio of Joseph, and its performance, under the direction of Mr. Walter Cecil Macfarren, its composer's brother (conductor-in-chief at our Royal Academy of Music), would alone mark the Leeds Festival of 1877 as one to be remembered. The performance was superb, from the overture to the final chorus; on no occasion do we remember more fixed attention paid to a new and important work; and since the production of Elijah at Birmingham, such an unqualified expression of approval from a vast audience as greeted the composer, when, almost as with a single shout, he was summoned back to the platform, is unprecedented. About the chorus sufficient has been said, and indeed it would be hard to say more. Equally painstaking and equally successful was the fine orchestra of Sir Michael Costa, who, though he did not conduct the performance of the oratorio, was observed as one of the most interested of those who listened. In his leading singers Professor Macfarren was more than usually happy. To name our own excellent artists, Edith Wynne, Patey, Edward Lloyd, and Santley, is equivalent to saying that in a new work by an English composer they all did their utmost. So, too, did the English bass who loves to be advertised as "Signor Foli." To the greatest stranger, however, the greatest honour is due, and to state that Emma Albani sang the very important music assigned to her with a perfection that must not merely have satisfied but surprised the composer is the simple unexaggerated truth. This alone would fairly entitle the Canadian songstress to be called "Queen of the Leeds Festival." In conclusion, three pieces, a duet for soprano and contralto, a triumphal chorus, and a sestet, were encored and repeated—a worthy climax to a performance in all respects unique. With regard to the miscellaneous concerts details are uncalled for. One feature, however, merits special record. The concert overture by the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, entitled Die Waldnymphe, was played at the last, under the direction (a fact to be noted) of Sir Michael Costa, who used his utmost means to obtain a thoroughly irreproachable performance, and succeeded to admiration. Remembering that Sterndale Bennett conducted the first Leeds Festival (1858), for which he composed his beautiful cantata, The May Queen, this was all the more gratifying to admirers of the overture itself and the genius of our much regretted countryman.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——Not a few followers of the National pastime consider the autumn meetings, and especially those at headquarters, the most enjoyable of the Turf season. And certainly the Newmarket gatherings have a special charm during September and October, for the racing is invariably good, and the Heath is most endurable, if not actually pleasant, presuming you are well provided against meteorological contingencies. In all respects the First October Meeting (which, more Hibernico, always comes off in September) has been an excellent and enjoyable one, the fields being numerically better than they often are at Newmarket. The almost invincible Lord Falmouth took a considerable share of the races on the opening day, winning the Boscawen Stakes with Redwing, and the Hopeful with Hydromel, while Jannette walked over for the Buckenham. The chief handicap of the meeting, called after the Great Eastern Railway, was also decided on the Tuesday, and attracted no less than twenty-two runners, of whom Ernest was made favourite at as short a price as 5 to 2. He, however could not go the pace from the very first, and was nowhere at the finish. It is not often that such an inexplicable mistake is made about a horse in these clever days. The talent were better inspired when they made Mandarin second favourite, as he won easily enough from Polly Perkins, the extreme outsider Bay Athol being third. But to many persons, both present and absent, the performances of two Cesarewitch favourites, Hilarious and Great Tom, were the most interesting features of the day. They were both beaten in their races, the former running second to Thunderstone for the Grand Duke Michael Stakes, and the latter filling the same place to Augusta in the Triennial. The supporters of Hilarious, however, need not be particularly distressed, as he ran a very good race with Thunderstone, who has very recently shown himself no mean animal. It is by no means improbable, by the way, that the gigantic son of Thunderbolt will be among the best of our Cup horses next season. Great Tom's defeat by Augusta is another matter, and combined with his evident unsoundness almost extinguishes his Cesarewitch chance. After the race Count Lagrange's filly was freely backed for the big handicap, but the furore soon cooled down, as it was pretty generally understood that at the weights the Count's other horse, Balagny, is the better of the two. At the time of writing he is first favourite for the race, and if his appearance on his arrival at Newmarket pleases good judges, he is not unlikely to be served up very hot before the start. On the second day the Little Agnes filly took the Two-Year Old Plate, King Olaf, contrary to expectation, not putting in an appearance. The Triennial was looked forward to with no little interest, as it was anticipated that Lady Golightly would dispute the stake with St. Christophe, who many say is really the best of the French three-year olds. Lord Falmouth, however, at the last moment declined to run his filly; and after all the French saint only just managed to get home in front of the moderate Briglia after a most punishing race. There are many old and young Turfites who will be glad to see Mr. H. E. Surtees' name as the owner of a winner, the Golden Fleece taking the Selling Stakes. Nurseries are always a feature at the Newmarket Autumn Meetings, and the first brought the goodly field of fourteen to the post. The winner, Telegram, was not spotted by the great body of backers, who made Plevna first favourite, according, however, the second place to the winner. Kebbuck took the First Foal Stakes for Lord Rosebery, and Prince Batthyany's Cerberus was made favourite for and won the Ditton Handicap.

COURSING.——The Plumpton meeting was all that could be desired. The Derby was divided between Mr. S. Postle's excellent dog Phantom and Mr. Hobbs's Gyges; and Mr. Ede's Queen Lydia took the Oaks, Lord St. Vincent's June running the decider with her. The Sussex Cup was divided between Early Morn and Sparkling Streamlet. There is a strong and increasing feeling against these constant decisions of the big Stakes at open meetings, and it might be worth while for the National Club to consider the matter with a view to at least limit the practice.—From Australia, where a large portion of the population seems to have gone coursing mad, we hear that Mr. Gore's Gitana has won the "Waterloo" Cup, that event at the Antipodes creating as much interest there as our Waterloo does here. The Australians have now got a splendid lot of dogs, derived from our best English blood; and their hares, owing to the excellence of the herbage, are swifter and stouter than ours.

AQUATICS.——As the time draws near for the Champion Match between Boyd and Higgins, their partisans become more anxious to hear of their well-being and progress in training. The last reports from the head-quarters of the two men are that both are in good fettle. Boyd has had a new skiff built for him by Swaddle and Winship, of Scotswood.

PEDESTRIANISM.——Our note of Gale's 1,500 miles' walk at Lillie Bridge is to the same effect as that of last week—viz., that he continues well and full of confidence, the accomplishment of the feat being now generally taken for granted.

LEGAL

THE PENGE MURDER.——The trial of the four persons accused of causing the death of Mrs. Harriet Staunton lasted through six days, and during the whole of that time the Court and its precincts were crowded with people, fashionably-dressed ladies struggling for a position where they could get a view of the prisoners. The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Mr. Poland, instructed by the Treasury, conducted the prosecution, and each of the prisoners was separately defended by counsel. The evidence for the prosecution consisted mainly of the facts which were elicited by the magisterial inquiry, to which, however, was added the evidence of the girl Clara Brown, who gave a totally different account of the matter from that to which she swore before the coroner, and which she now declares was false, and was given in order to screen the prisoners. The defence rested mainly on the contention that the death of Mrs. Staunton was not the result of starvation but of tubercular disease, a theory which was supported by several medical witnesses; and on behalf of Mrs. Patrick Staunton it was further argued by Mr. Straight that whatever she had done was done under the coercion and control of her husband. But Mr. Justice Hawkins ruled that the presence of the husband did not absolve the woman from the consequences of her own acts, and in support of his opinion referred to the case of the Mannings, in which both husband and wife were convicted. On Wednesday Mr. Justice Hawkins summed up the case in a very elaborate speech, the delivery of which lasted eleven hours. The jury, after being out of court for an hour and twenty-five minutes, found all the prisoners guilty of Wilful Murder, but recommended the two females to mercy, Alice Rhodes strongly. During the progress of the trial there were several "scenes" in court, the female prisoners fainting away, and the proceedings being stopped until they could be brought again to consciousness. During the delivery of the verdict and the passing of sentence the demeanour of the prisoners was most distressing, Alice Rhodes fell back sobbing as soon as she heard the fatal word, "Guilty." Mrs. Staunton retained her self-possession for some time, but at last gave way. Louis Staunton appeared quite cool throughout, but his brother Patrick was greatly agitated, and evidently anxious about his wife. When asked the usual question if they had anything to say in stay of execution, Mrs. Staunton replied, "No," and Alice Rhodes, "No, I am innocent," both speaking in such a low tone that their answers had to be repeated by officers of the Court. The crowd outside the Court was large, and noisy, and did not disperse until after eleven o'clock, long after the Court had closed.

THE DETECTIVE CASE.——After a preliminary hearing which extended over twenty-eight days, spread over a period of about nine weeks, Messrs. Meiklejohn, Druscovich, Palmer, and Clarke, the detectives, and their alleged co-conspirator Mr. Froggatt, have been at last committed for trial, and we shall be relieved from the case until the November Sessions. Palmer and Clarke protested complete innocence of the charges made against them by Benson and Kurr, while Froggatt created some sensation by reading the opinions of the Solicitor-General and Mr. Harvey, counsel to the Treasury, to the effect that his prosecution was ill-advised and premature, and that it should not be proceeded with unless evidence were forthcoming to corroborate the testimony of the convicts. Mr. Pollard, assistant-solicitor to the Treasury, stated that, in taking Kurr's depositions, the convict, up to the end of the fourth day made no allusion to Clarke being mixed up with the De Goncourt fraud. He had known Clarke over twenty years, and always found him a most trustworthy and reliable officer. Palmer had done his duty fearlessly, honestly, and correctly. Mr. Lewis, on behalf of Clarke, contended that his connection with Benson and Kurr was solely one of business, and that he was led to believe Benson was a man who could give him valuable information respecting the Turf frauds. The convicts he characterised as two of the greatest scoundrels that ever disgraced a Court of Justice, and their object evidently was to get rid of Clarke and have him confined in prison, in order that their associates might continue their fraudulent conduct with impunity. Police evidence was then given by members of the detective force, with the object of showing that for the detection of crime it was absolutely necessary to associate with and entertain the worst class of thieves and reprobates. The same bail as hitherto was accepted for both Clarke and Mr. Froggatt, but the other prisoners are retained in custody.

THE CITY ROAD BURGLARY.——Frederick John Chalkley, the young man who was accused of being concerned in this crime, has died in the Clerkenwell House of Detention, whither he had been removed from St. Bartholomew's Hospital. An inquest was opened on Friday last in the prison, when evidence was taken tending to prove the complete innocence of the deceased, his statement about getting wounded in a drunken frolic in the Farringdon Road being supported by Charles Thomas, a friend in whose company he had spent the whole evening, and by the landlord of the public-house, in whose house they were at closing time (midnight). It will be remembered that the burglary took place soon after 11 P.M. The mother of the deceased said that her son had told her that he was innocent, that he was never in the City Road, and that his injuries were got through falling over a hoarding in the Farringdon Road. She had been to the place and seen the blood. She also complained of the manner in which her son had been treated by the police at the Islington Police Station, and said that she had told the inspector on duty that she was sure they would kill her boy.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Gas consumers generally ought to be grateful to the Rev. R. O. T. Thorpe, of Christ Church, Camberwell, who has undertaken to fight the South Metropolitan Gas Company on the question of measurement. His meter having shown that he consumed a much larger quantity of gas during the Midsummer quarter than in the preceding Christmas quarter, he has allowed the Company to summons him for the amount charged. The case has been adjourned, and we hope that, if it cannot be clearly shown that the means of measurement are reliable, he will gain the day, or carry the case to a higher Court, if possible.—"Look to your Policies" is the advice of "A Surgeon," who, writing to the Echo, calls attention to the case of one of his patients who, having broken his leg, and who, although he ultimately recovered, had his sufferings greatly increased by anxiety lest erysipelas should supervene. It seems that he had a life policy for 1,000*l*. in an Accident Insurance Society, which, however, would be completely void in case of erysipelas setting in. In another case the policy was actually declared void on the same plea, and the widow, who had expected 1,000*l*., got nothing. "A Surgeon" pungently remarks that "as it is so well known that erysipelas occurs but too frequently after an accident, the insurance societies might as well offer a premium for a broken nose, and decline to pay if it bled at the time."—One of the oldest dodges of the street swindler is to drop a "duffing" ring made in imitation of old jewellery, and then, as some unsuspecting wayfarer is passing by, to pick it up and offer it for sale as a lucky find. This trick was successfully practised about a month ago in Oxford Street, the victims being a simple-minded dairyman, who was naturally very wroth when he discovered the true nature of his bargain. He had not, however, long to wait for his revenge, for last week the same sharper met him again, and, forgetting the features of his former dupe, tried to play off "the same old game" upon him. The ring-dropper is now in custody, probably bewailing the shortness of his memory.—Last Saturday an attempt was made to revive the riots at the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts. A number of gentlemen (?) annoyed the rest of the company by pushing violently about. The proprietors interfered, and quelled the disturbance by expelling the offenders, one of whom, a Mr. Dudgeon, threatened to "wait for" the person who had complained of his conduct. He was as good as his word, and when that gentleman came out he violently assaulted him. The result was that Mr. Dudgeon was locked up, and on Monday he seemed much astonished when the magistrate sentenced him to two months' hard labour. On Wednesday the complainant went again to Bow Street, and pleaded for a mitigation of the sentence passed upon his assailant, but Mr. Vaughan refused to alter it.—The two youths who are accused of committing the highway robberies on Blackheath have been committed for trial.—Mr. Froggatt, the solicitor, appears to have more difficulties than one upon his hands. On Tuesday he was summoned to the Westminster County Court for neglecting the order of the Court requiring him to pay 2*l.*, the amount of a hatter's bill. Mr. Froggatt's clerk appeared, and said that his employer was in bad health, and that the prosecution at Bow Street had deprived him of practice. It was ultimately agreed that 10*s.* a month should be paid.—An extraordinary feat of agility was performed on Sunday last at Hanley by a thief, who was running away from a constable. The man darted into the old church, which was open for service, and made his way up to the top of the tower with the policeman at his heels. On reaching the top he vaulted the parapet, and sliding down the lightning conductor at the risk of his life got clear away, and has not since been heard of.—The policeman who committed a burglary at a public-house at Brentford has been sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. The trial took place at the Central Criminal Court before the Common Serjeant.—We have often had to comment upon the conduct of the police in too readily assuming that a person found insensible in the streets is drunk when he may possibly be dead or dying. The other day a case of an opposite character occurred. A cabman was found by a constable lying on the kerb beside his cab, and a gentleman, who said he was a doctor, pronounced him to be dead, and advised his removal to a mortuary. When, however, an attempt was made to lift the body a shout of "What's your game?" proved indisputably that life was not extinct. Cabby was thereupon incontinently "run in," and next morning the Marlborough Street magistrate, after indulging in a little joke about his having been "dead drunk," let him off without a fine.

AUTUMN SEASON, 1877.

AS A CATERER for Public Patronage, I again beg to announce that my List for the Autumn Season is now complete. Few London Traders are in a position to submit the selection I offer to the Public, and no one surpasses me for variety, good taste, and excellent value. I have a splendid selection of Dress Materials, suitable for all purposes and any position in life. It would be quite impossible to enumerate the mass of patterns that represent my stock; I will content myself by mentioning just a few of the most notable goods and the regulation dress fabrics, such as Merinos, Cashmeres, Velveteens, &c., of which every lady knows the intrinsic value. In these goods I claim Cashmeres and Merinos as my Speciality, and feel justified in saying I can defy every Trader in England to touch me either for Quality, Colour, or Value.

JAMES CHAPMAN, Notting Hill.

BLACK SILKS.

RICH THICK CORDED Gros Grains, 4s. 11d. per yard, superb in colour and finish, equal in value to those usually sold at 7s. 11d. with as much appearance as Messrs. BONNET'S at 15s. per Yard. WILL WEAR as well as any Silk than can be bought at the same price in England, but Ladies must not confound them with my celebrated IMPERIAL Silks, which are altogether a different manufacture.

JAPANESE SILKS.

THE MOST EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT IN LONDON TO SELECT FROM.

In consequence of the depreciation in the value of silk, I am compelled to reduce the whole of my Japanese Stock very nearly to what they cost me. The new tariff is as under:

Brilliant quality . . . 1s. 11½d. per yard.
The richest quality made . . 2s. 3½d. "

VELVETEENS.

The great favour already accorded to Velveteens this season is a sufficient indication of their popularity, and no wonder! For what with their extreme usefulness, combined with the handsome and rich appearance which is the distinguishing feature of these highly finished goods, they form a costume which is matchless at the price. In Coloured Velveteens the new winter shades look most superb, and in Blacks this beautiful fabric is better than ever, having quite a regal effect. Prices 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 5s. 6d. per yard.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES'

(AS WORN BY H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES)

Alpaca has always been a favourite dress material, and it certainly has not lost its popularity during the last few years. Since I had the good fortune to introduce the celebrated Danish Silk-Finished Tinted Alpacas to the public, the annual sale has more than trebled. The manufacture is brought to such perfection that for many purposes Alpaca is used in place of Silk. Imitations of it are numerous, but not one has ever been made to compare with the genuine article for brilliancy and lightness. The most perfect and by far the largest assortment to select from in the metropolis. Over fifty new tinted shades, any length cut, 1s. 11½d. per yard, 28 inches wide.

FRENCH CASHMERE.

It is legitimate to suppose when so many imitations are produced of one special fabric that the material itself should be perfection; and, correctly speaking, that is the only word that will convey an idea of the French Cashmere I now advertise. It is really quite perfect—in colour, in quality, in value, in effect—in everything that goes to make up a beautiful dress. They are specially dyed to match my silks, and cannot fail to elicit unqualified admiration. 46 in. wide, 3s. 3d. per yard.

FINEST FRENCH MERINOS

(INDIA CASHMERE FINISH)

Are better than ever, finer, purer. The dyes, if possible, are more perfect. In one colour I have no less than eleven shades, all clear, distinct tones. The patterns of these highly finished goods are alone sufficient to tempt one to buy. They convey the idea of a pretty dress immediately you see them. The sale I had for these goods last season was so immense that, anticipating an equally large, if not larger, demand this year, I have secured an unlimited supply from the chief French houses in Roubaix, covering the whole winter season, which will, I think, enable me to execute every order I receive, so that I shall not have the annoyance of being compelled to decline the patronage of any lady. 44 in. wide, 2s. 11½d. per yard.

ALBATROSS CLOTH.

These truly exquisite cloths, "having no admixture of Cotton or Silk, thereby rendering them quite impervious to rain, sun, or sea-water," are the most stylish plain woollen fabrics it has ever been my fortune to buy. I recommend them with great confidence, feeling certain that they will give unlimited satisfaction. 30 in. wide, 2s. 11d. per yard.

CAMEL HAIR CLOTH.

A most notable looking Fabric. One of the charms of this novelty is the weight; for though its appearance would suggest it being excessively thick and heavy, it is so light that a length of 20 yards weighs less than 6 lb. For promenade and out-door Costumes it will be a leading favourite. 26 in. wide, 2s. 9d. per yard.

SNOWFLAKE TWEED.

The white thread that is woven in little uneven patches across the Tweed is the origin of its name, and will convey some idea of its appearance. When judiciously combined with the plain cloth, this Tweed makes up most effectively; and being very inexpensive, it will undoubtedly prove a most desirable dress to ladies who are not disposed to give much money for their requirements. 26 in. wide, 1s. 6¼d. per yard.

SERGES.

If anything new could be said respecting Serges, the set of patterns now before me would most certainly enable me to do so. The variety seems unlimited, and the various prices, ranging from 6¾d. to 3s. 11d. per yard, will meet the requirements of all classes. Twelve yards of Serge, costing 6s. 9d., is a marvel of cheapness and durability, and, if space permitted, I could eulogise each quality on its merits, until I am afraid my readers would get tired of reading them.

SAXONY WOOL.

No Costume could be prettier than one made of the closely-woven Saxony wool. It is highly dressed, and looks like a faced cloth, and when trimmed with the arabesque galloons that are now so fashionable is in perfect taste. Some beautiful shades in light browns will be found in this range of patterns. 26 in. wide, 1s. 6½d. per yard.

FRENCH TWILLED FLANNELS.

Twilled Flannels is now a recognised Material for Dresses, and very pretty and useful they are. For Winter Wear, the Double Milled Goods are recommended as being extra warm, particularly for children. The novel tones of colour that are fashionable this season have all been produced in these beautiful goods, the rich shades of orange and the favourite Mandarin being conspicuously noticeable. Some exquisite shades of Drab will merit attention. All are perfectly fast colours. 30 in. wide, 1s. 11½d. per yard.

THE GEM.

"I was quite surprised to find it was only 1s. per yard, it really looks worth 2s." was a remark passed upon this very cloth the other day by a lady; and in my experience I have always found ladies very keen judges of dress goods. I don't doubt but it will be the verdict of the general public, for it is very neat and very good.

HALF-A-SOVEREIGN FOR A FRENCH-WOVE CORSET.

Richly embroidered in every gore, also entirely down front. A beautiful specimen of French workmanship. Admirably suited for the present cuirasse bodices, being a deep corset with spoon busk. Size of waist only requisite. Forwarded to any part of the Kingdom on receipt of P.O.O.

SKIRTINGS.

Now that every dress is made of a plain material, and more or less looped up, the under skirt becomes as much a matter of consideration and importance as the outer dress. To meet this necessity, manufacturers have produced some most striking and effective materials for the purpose. Some have a multiplicity of fine lines, making a complete and pleasing whole, while others are quite simple, with broad black stripes a couple of inches or more wide. There are many styles, suitable for all tastes. The patterns, unfortunately, fail to convey an adequate idea of these goods, but my customers will allow for that. In all cases it must be remembered the stripes go longitudinally; 45 in. wide. Prices 1s. 11½d., 2s. 11½d., 3s. 10½d., and 4s. 11½d. per yard.

COMPLETE SETS OF PATTERNS FORWARDED TO ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE SAME DAY AS RECEIPT OF ORDER.

Topics of the Week

FRANCE IN 1851 AND 1877.——The publication of Victor Hugo's "History of a Crime"—the said crime being the seizure of absolute power by the Prince-President, Louis Napoleon, in 1851—may at the present time serve a useful purpose. The near Past is so soon obliterated by ceaseless waves of fresh events that Frenchmen will do well to refresh their memories with the details of that memorable political conspiracy. There are rumours that, in case public opinion should go against them at the polls, the Reactionaries may adopt a device of a similar character. It is just possible, especially if the Republicans should abandon the remarkable self-restraint which they have hitherto displayed, that force may be used to atone for the failure of the ballot-boxes, but it is most improbable that anything resembling the extraordinary feat of 1851 will be repeated. At that epoch, it must be remembered, Republicanism was identified in the minds of most men with National workshops and street barricades, the "Red Spectre of 1852" was an object of morbid dread, while, on the other hand, the name of Bonaparte recalled dim traditions of past glories. People were weary, too, of the squabbles and delays of Parliament-men; they longed for the firm rule and prompt administration of an individual hand. And so it came to pass that when "Pride's Purge" was administered by some bluff Bonapartist soldier, and scores of Representatives of the Sovereign People were hurried off to Mazas prison, no genuine sympathy for the victims was aroused. As for the abortive street fighting on the Boulevards, it helped rather than hindered the conspirators' plot, for when people asked what the President was doing, and heard that he was exorcising the "Red Spectre of 1852," they were pleased, and hailed him as the "Saviour of Society." Six-and-twenty years have wrought a wonderful change. It is difficult to conjure with a name that recalls Sedan rather than Austerlitz; the present Republic has been some years in existence, it bears a most respectable character, and has had the honour of the patronage of the late M. Thiers; while, lastly, we should be loth to believe that Marshal MacMahon and his coadjutors; however ill-advised they may be, have descended to the moral level of that crew of adventurers who, mainly for their own selfish ends, hoisted Louis Napoleon on to his uncle's throne.

SUNDAY TRADING.——Judging from a scene reported at the last meeting of the St. Luke's Vestry the "Sunday trading" question, at least in the Metropolis, seems as far off a settlement as ever, at any rate in some localities. It may be taken for granted that some Sunday trading, especially in what are called perishable articles, is absolutely necessary in the interests of the poor; and most reasonable persons would agree that any legislation which would render it utterly impossible for the young, middle-aged, or old, who throng the streets to obtain a little fruit, tobacco, or sweets on the Sunday, would be intolerable. The public-house question stands on its own merits and demerits. Let vendors of the articles just mentioned keep their shops open or not as they like; there is no fear of the majority so doing, or of the majority of other tradesmen in the Metropolis generally deliberately depriving themselves of one day of rest from business out of seven. The Sunday trading question as it has long stood in its practical aspect is confined to the Sunday morning markets in certain streets, such as the New Cut, Lambeth, Leather Lane, and Whitecross Street, St. Luke's. These markets are known by the name of Costermonger Markets, and rightly so, too, as itinerant vendors of various articles have gradually established them. The petty tradesmen of the different localities where they are held share the business, which is a brisk one; and it is mainly through the desire of the latter to have all the business to themselves that difficulties have arisen. That these markets are a nuisance and scandal to many inhabitants of the district going to and returning from their places of worship is notorious, and hence Vestries and District Boards of Works have been led to take action with a view to put the markets down altogether. Not wishing to put the practically obsolete Charles II.'s Act against Sunday trading into force, the line of action has been to get the petty local traders and costermongers to agree to suspend business simultaneously at half-past ten in the forenoon. But unfortunately, though both parties have in many instances agreed to this, each has broken the compact in its desire of doing business at the expense of the other. Hence the long-standing troubles in St. Luke's. We are of opinion that the half-past ten compromise, though wanting in logic, is a most reasonable one, and for the benefit of all parties concerned ought to be enforced.

ENGLISH OPINION CONCERNING THE WAR.——The "Military Correspondent" of The Times, whose very interesting "Fallacies about the War" appeared in the columns of that journal on Wednesday last, is scarcely correct, we venture to think, in asserting that "never since the Crimean War have the English been so deeply moved by any foreign fighting." It seems to us that the opposing currents of popular opinion in this country were stronger during the American Civil War than during the present contest. At that time nearly every place where men gathered together—nay, nearly every family—was divided into two hostile camps. English Federals and Confederates fought each other almost as vigorously with tongue and pen, as their American prototypes with sword and gun. But perhaps the "Military Correspondent" refuses to call our Transatlantic kinsmen "foreigners." If such be the case, our contention against him falls to the ground; and we fully agree with him that the interest felt by our countrymen in the Russo-Turkish contest is unprecedented. This exceeding interest is, moreover, the more noteworthy, because the contending nations are, both socially and geographically, more remote from us than Frenchmen or Germans, Italians or Spaniards. At the same time, substantial reasons may be given for the interest excited. First of all, the quarrel is of long standing, and of world-wide fame. The Eastern Question has been the bugbear of generations of statesmen. Next, the issue of the quarrel might seriously affect the stability of our Indian Empire. Lastly, we have ourselves taken the part of a belligerent in the quarrel, and might feel bound to do so again. These circumstances, besides other startling incidents which ushered in the contest, were quite sufficient to produce a very keen interest in this country. As for the present condition of public feeling here, it is, we think, correctly described by the "Military Correspondent." There can be little doubt that "an anti-Russian feeling" does "immensely preponderate," in spite of Mr. Gladstone's assertion that this sentiment is chiefly confined to Londoners. Yet it does not follow, because Englishmen dislike the Russian policy, that they like Turkish dominion. Within a year or two before the war began, the Turks contrived to wound us in two of our most sensitive points. They ceased to pay the interest on the money they had borrowed, and they crushed Bulgarian revolt in a most ruthless fashion. If latterly the Turk has regained some of his former popularity with us, it is because of his self-denying courage, and not from any admiration for those who rule over him. What the mass of Englishmen would like to see in Turkey is a Government administering even-handed justice to all alike, and solicitous of the well-being of the people. Judging from her antecedents, and from the backward condition of her own population, they do not believe that Russia, if victorious, either could or would establish such an administration in Turkey; while, by her violent interference, she has in a few months been the means of inflicting more misery on the Christian populations of the Empire than they would have endured in half-a-century of unopposed Ottoman dominion.

ENDURANCE FEATS.——Everything must come to an end some time or other, and consequently Gale's great walk at Lillie Bridge; and probably the anticipation that he will successfully complete his 1,500 miles in 1,000 hours will be in accordance with the fact. The feat is to be concluded on Saturday afternoon, a date evidently judiciously arranged with a view to "gate" money. If the pedestrian holds on the even but painful tenour of his way for a few hours after this Note is in the hands of our readers, thousands will flock to the well-known track to see—what? Not a spirited contest between athletes, or a plucky athletic performance executed in a given time and within a reasonable compass of human endurance, but the ending of a long torture of physical powers, and of a test feat as to the extreme capacity of the bodily frame to bear up against the want of natural rest and natural means of recuperation. Granted that Gale's walk, if successful, will be a most wonderful one, that the pedestrian will have exhibited unprecedented powers of endurance, and that some remarkable if not valuable physiological phenomena may be put on record from it, still we hold that such a feat conduces to no substantial good either in the way of sport or in any other aspect. The spectacle of a man, by the exercise of a kind of mere brute endurance, struggling for so long a period against the laws of Nature, and enduring bodily and mental agonies better felt than described, is by no means an edifying one, and certainly not conducive to the interests of real sport; while the interest taken in the performance is of an unhealthy and morbid character. To see how a man looks after such a trial will be the chief attraction to the thousands who may be expected at Lillie Bridge on Saturday, and we can but hope that his enterprise may not have a fatal ending, as has been the case with a man named Hunter, at Sunderland, who died after walking 160 miles in forty-eight hours. As every one knows, this exhibition is not the first of its kind by very many; but when, it may be asked, are such exhibitions to end? Is mere endurance to be one of the chief features of modern athletic performances? We may not have yet reached the known limit of such endurance; but are trials to be persevered with to the danger of life and health till that is ascertained? It may be difficult to draw a line between the legitimate and illegitimate in such matters; but surely there is a limit to what we will venture again to stigmatise as feats of mere "brute" endurance.

LIBRARIANS IN COUNCIL.——The old idea of a librarian was that of a grave bookish man of sedentary habits, who rarely strayed far from his beloved folios and quartos. Steam and electricity, however, that aggressive pair of revolutionists, have got hold of the librarian, and have metamorphosed him. He has become an adventurous traveller. A magnet, in the shape of a Conference, is set up in Finsbury Circus, and forthwith he and his mates come flocking in from all parts of the compass. Not only from English provincial towns, from Dublin, and from Edinburgh; but also from Paris, Brussels, and Palermo, from Boston and Chicago, and even from antipodal Melbourne. The speeches at the opening meeting were of a business-like character, and there can be little doubt but that this collision of librarian intellects will elicit some sparks of valuable knowledge. The most formidable difficulty in the way of the curators of large libraries seems to be the arrangement of catalogues; and the reason why catalogues are so troublesome is that the libraries to which they serve as the guide posts are not only big at the present time, but are perpetually growing bigger, and that in a rapidly increasing ratio. Is there any remedy for this difficulty? Yes, there is a remedy, of a very simple character, and we hope somebody at the Conference will have the kindness to mention it. There ought, in the formation of such libraries as that of the British Museum, to be some discrimination made in the selection of books. Which is better, a vast assemblage of books, which by the year 2,077 will occupy, judging by the present rate of increase, the greater part of Bloomsbury; or a smaller, thoroughly manageable, and really valuable library? At the present time, in the British Museum Library, there are many books lacking, and not of a very recondite character either, which ought to be there; while, on the other hand, there are tons upon tons of what is no better than rubbish. We would compel, as at present, all publishers to send a copy of each of their works to the Museum, but these works should be submitted to a committee, like the Hanging Committee of the Royal Academy, who should decide which to keep and which to return. A catalogue of these rejected treasures might be published annually, and then we should have no reason to fear that posterity would be deprived of a specimen, for some eccentric or other would be sure to preserve one, if only for the honour and glory of possessing something which was not in the National Collection.

COACH HORSES.——The old-fashioned coach horse, good as he was in his vocation, has long become an animal of the past, for the simple reason that he is no longer wanted. But it is hardly necessary to say that coaches and coach horses still exist in very considerable numbers; and at present there seems no sign that the comparatively modern revival of four-in-hand driving is likely to die out yet awhile. The summer, or "butterfly," coaches which make their journeys, longer or shorter as the case may be, into country districts during the months of May, June, July, and August, have become regular institutions of the London season, and when that season is ended the sales of the studs which follow in quick succession week after week are almost the only excitement for horsey men who linger in and about the metropolis. These sales have been particularly good of late, the horses fetching high prices. Among the most recent of the studs put up to auction have been those of the Twickenham and the Portsmouth coaches, the forty-six animals belonging to the latter realising an average of 41½ guineas, while a pair produced 152 guineas, and a single horse 70 guineas. These animals were mostly of the modern as distinguished from the olden type of coach horse, being active hunters, or suitable for hunting purposes. Not many years ago it was considered rank heresy to put a collar on a riding horse, or to work hunters at all during the summer. The old custom was to turn hunters out to grass, or to to "summer" them with their shoes off in an old barn, or outhouse, on tan or sawdust, under the idea that they "recovered their legs" by the rest. A different and more reasonable view is now taken, and, practically, it has been found better for the animals to keep them in good exercise, even in the collar, during the summer months. When turned out to grass they are driven half mad by flies and gallop themselves off their legs, and are liable to all kinds of accidents connected with their novel sort of life, and when kept in barns, outhouses, and yards they stand still till their legs swell. Suppose a generation ago, when men fancied they knew as much about horses as they do now, the modern practice had been suggested, the very idea would have been thought madness, and yet now it is accepted on all hands as truth. The fact is a strange comment on our treatment of horses, on which we have prided ourselves almost for centuries.

RUSSIAN AND TURKISH GENERALS.——Both combatants appear to have taken advantage of the recent cessation of active operations in Bulgaria to make some changes in their commanding officers. The Russians have at length discovered that a multitude of Grand Dukes in prominent positions may tend rather to impede than to ensure success, and the appointment of Todleben, the defender of Sebastopol, to direct the operations before Plevna, indicates that the wasteful method of headlong, yet badly-supported assaults, is to be exchanged for more cautious processes. The changes on the Turkish side are of a more remarkable character. Mehemet Ali is recalled, being superseded by Suleiman Pasha, whose command at the Shipka is assumed by Raouf Pasha. The fault alleged against Mehemet Ali is probably that he has been too cautious, and his recent retreat helped to seal his fate. Caution, on the contrary, cannot be alleged as one of Suleiman's characteristics. To outsiders his conduct for many weeks past has seemed rash in the highest degree, for he has thrown away the lives of thousands of the best soldiers in the Sultan's service in his vain efforts to carry the Shipka Pass, instead of leaving sufficient troops to hold Radetsky back, and marching the remainder to help his sorely-beleaguered comrade, Osman Pasha. The mystery of Suleiman's conduct has never yet been explained; but it is plain that his policy is approved at the Porte, and it is scarcely credible at such a crisis as this, when the fate of the Empire hangs in the balance, that palace intrigues would promote an incapable commander to such an all-important post as that on the Lom. Judging from the antecedents of the leaders, it seems probable that just as the Russians are about to adopt a more wary policy, the main Turkish forces will be more actively engaged than heretofore. But, on the one hand, the arrival of large Russian reinforcements, and, on the other, the advent of the autumn rains, render all predictions at this moment especially hazardous.

LAUNDRY REFORM.——Before the scare on this question created by articles in medical contemporaries, and more recently revived by a paper read by Mr. E. Watherstone at the Social Science Congress, dies away, it may be well to inquire whether we have not already at hand certain appliances to meet the requirements of the case. There have been in existence for some time past what may be called public laundries on a pretty extensive scale, and it is by no means improbable that the attention drawn to the matter will cause the establishment of one or more large laundry companies in the Metropolis, and perhaps in other large centres of population; but we will venture to suggest that the labour of the inmates of our workhouses and prisons might be at once utilised in this direction. The cost of the appliances in addition to those already at work in such institutions would not be a matter for serious consideration, and we have a strong opinion that both the public and the ratepayers would profit by laundry work being introduced, especially in workhouses. It would probably be much more remunerative labour than that which is expended on oakum picking and the production of firewood, and men could work at it as well as women. Workhouses, generally speaking, are kept scrupulously clean, and the clothing of the inmates and the linen of the house might be kept entirely separate from that of the public sent to the house. The matter is, of course, one which would require much calculation as to detail; and we are quite aware of the objections which might be raised against the proposition on the score that it would throw out of employment a great many hard-working persons. It would be a branch of the long-standing prison labour question, which, however, we are inclined to think has been made a good deal too much of by philanthropists. These matters of trade and business if left alone soon settle themselves. We throw out the suggestion for what it is worth, leaving it to others to try and put it into form.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

WITH THE RUSSIANS—GORNY STUDEN

THE four small illustrations on our front page are from photographs by M. F. Duschek, of Bucharest, who appears to be energetically prosecuting his labours in the field, and to be securing permanent records of many interesting events in the campaign. The subjects need little description, as they explain themselves, but we may mention that General Ignatieff, who many people regard as a Muscovite Bismarck, and as having the chief hand in bringing about the war, has now left Gorny Studen for Kieff—according to official reports, for the sake of his health.

Gorny Studen, the present headquarters of the Czar and his Staff, is a little Bulgarian village built on the sides of a little valley, chiefly on the southern slope. Like most Bulgarian villages, there is little pretension to symmetry or regularity, the streets being scattered about in picturesque confusion, some of them standing as it were upon their own legs, and others clinging to the hill sides. Comparatively speaking, however, a writer in The Times tells us Gorny Studen is regular and symmetrical. In the middle of the village stands the church, built in the form of a parallelogram, with a semicircle added on the eastern side, and a portico supported by three arches, with columns on the façade. The northern slope of the valley is occupied chiefly by Turkish houses, which were deserted by their owners when the Russians approached. One of these, the residence of a rich Bulgarian, was taken for the use of the Emperor, tents being put up round about for the Staff and attendants.

BEFORE PLEVNA

NEWSPAPER correspondents have suffered severely during the present campaign, and, what between fever and semi-starvation, they have had a very hard lot to bear during the past few weeks, especially those whose duty it has been to chronicle the events before Plevna. Our sketch depicts the quarters of some of these gentlemen in the Russian lines, and some idea of the discomfort and hardships endured may be gathered from the following few lines written by a correspondent of the Standard, "Cheerless, indeed, were my camps under the twelve-gun battery, whilst the bombardment of Plevna went on. A deadly chill rose from the ground, even when it did not rain. The morning broke cold, not clear and sunny, it struggled through a dense mist full of malaria. The night before and the night after the battle one had extreme difficulty in keeping warm; keeping dry was out of the question."

Another sketch portrays the Czar, the Grand Duke Nicholas, and Prince Charles of Roumania watching the progress of the assault on Plevna from an elevated mound near the Gravitza position. Plevna, it has been said, was promised as a birthday gift to the Czar by his brother, but as he sits there watching his soldiers being hurled back from the Turkish redoubts, he reminds us somewhat of another monarch, King Canute, on the sea shore rebuking his followers for their exaggerated estimate of his sovereign power. There was one bright spot in the gloomy scene, the capture of the Gravitza redoubt, which won high eulogiums from the Czar and his brother for the Russo-Roumanian forces who took part in the assault.

WITH THE ROUMANIANS—CAPTURED GUNS AT BUCHAREST

THE chief glory in the capture of the Gravitza redoubt has been unhesitatingly awarded to the little Roumanian army, which thus has taken its revenge for the contemptuous sneers which previous to this affair were ordinarily hurled at it. Several guns were captured in the attack—one a Krupp and the others of German manufacture (at first but erroneously attributed to British manufacture). With pardonable pride the Roumanians had three of these guns taken to Bucharest, and there on the 23rd ult. two were paraded before the Princess Elizabeth in the St. Michael Square, and subsequently planted opposite the Senate House, one on each side of the statue of Michael Le Brave, a celebrated Roumanian chief who defeated the Turks, Poles, and Hungarians 400 years ago, and was finally assassinated in his camp by the Hungarians.

TALLADALE AND LOCH MAREE

THIS charmingly picturesque district, where Her Majesty has recently been staying, is situated in the north-western part of Ross-shire. The loch itself stretches in a north-westerly direction for about eighteen miles, and in some places is more than two miles in breadth. It is studded with beautifully wooded islands, the largest of which is Isle Maree, to which the Queen paid a visit during her stay at the Talladale Hotel. On the southern shore of this island is a curious circle of stones, supposed to mark the last resting-place of some noble or ecclesiastical dignitary of ancient times; and on the west are the ruins of a chapel, believed by some writers to have been dedicated to the Virgin, the name "Maree" being, as they think, a corruption of "Mary." Others, however, are of opinion that the patron of the chapel was St. Maelruba or Mulroy, who died in 722, and that the island was named after him. There is also a well, the water of which is famous in tradition for its miraculous cures in cases of insanity; a drink of it had, however, to be supplemented by a ducking within it, and by the much more objectionable process of being towed round the island after a boat—an ordeal which was actually undergone some twenty years ago by a patient, with the not surprising result of changing quiet imbecility to raving madness. Close to the well stands a tree, into the bark of which every visitor is expected to place a coin a custom which was doubtless observed by the Royal party. A pathetic story is told of a certain Prince and Princess of Norway, whose bodies lie buried on the island. The Princess, who lived in the vicinity, put out on the lake in her pleasure boat to meet her lover on his return from an expedition, and it having been previously agreed between them that if she was in health a white flag should be placed on the masthead, and if unwell a black one, she in sport resolved to feign death, and laid herself out in state, with the black signal waving over her. The Prince, overcome with grief at the sight, stabbed himself with his dagger; and the Princess, determined not to survive him, following his rash example, the lovers died in each other's arms.

THE PROPOSED POLAR EXPEDITION — HOW TO REACH THE POLE BY BALLOONS purpose—namely, a Free Library, a Natural History Museum, and class rooms and laboratory for Science and Art classes in connection with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The cost of erection will be about 50,000*l.*, of which 10,000*l.* has been anonymously contributed by a gentleman residing in the neighbourhood, the remainder being defrayed by the Corporation of the town. The architect is Mr. R. Mawson, who expects to get the work completed in time for the meeting of the British Association in 1879. The ceremony of laying the foundation stone took place on Thursday last week, and was performed by the Mayor, who placed beneath it a bottle, containing besides the usual newspapers and coins, specimens of the latest fashions in ladies' and gentlemens dress, and samples of Nottingham hosiery, including a silk stocking, "as worn by Her Majesty," of so fine a texture that a dozen pairs weigh only 3¼ ounces. Amongst the company present were Lord Belper (Lord Lieutenant of the county), the Earl of Carnarvon, the Duke of St. Albans, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. S. Morley, M.P., and there was a large number of spectators. The Earl of Carnarvon complimented the townsfolk upon the appreciation of the value of culture which they had displayed, and Mr. Gladstone made a speech, in which he eulogised the German system of education, remarking that if there was a country in the world which in this century deserved credit for the advancement of higher education, that country was Germany. He also referred to the ardent desire for knowledge exhibited by Welshmen and Scotchmen; and said that what they demanded was that every human being should get all the cultivation of which he was capable, and that it should be a life-long process, which should terminate only on the day when he was called to another world under another dispensation. At the luncheon which followed the ceremony, Mr. S. Morley, in proposing the principal toast, congratulated Nottingham upon the national character which education now assumed, and contrasted it with the restrictions which formerly existed, which restrictions, he said, had deprived him and many other loyal subjects of the Queen of the advantages of a university education. Mr. Gladstone made another long speech, proposing success to the University, pointing out the general advantages of knowledge, and the refining and cultivating power of study. They had no religious problem to cope with, and without direct responsibility they would proceed in a spirit of thorough genuine respect and affection for religion, reverence for the rights of conscience, and determination to do nothing to injure its sacred interests, but to promote the cause of religion as opportunities might offer.

HOW TO REACH THE POLE

All attempts made by various nations to reach the North Pole have, up to the present time, resulted in failure, but a novel plan has been suggested by Commander Cheyne, R.N., which appears to afford some hope that the idea for which so much money has been spent, and so many hardships endured, may ere long be un fait accompli. On the very day upon which the telegram arrived in London from Capt. Nares, announcing the failure of the principal object of his mission, Commander Cheyne delivered a lecture at Tunbridge Wells on Arctic Exploration, in which he suggested the employment of balloons, and since that time he has strongly and continuously advocated the scheme, without as yet receiving much encouragement from either the Government or the nation. The go-ahead Americans have, however, already taken time by the forelock, and ordered balloons to be equipped for the main part of their Polar Expedition, which is to leave New York early next year, and Mr. W. de Fonvielle has been selected by Captain Howgate to join the scientific staff of the expedition, for the express purpose of conducting the balloon work.

Our sketch is taken from a view in Commander Cheyne's "Illustrated Lecture on Polar Exploration," and shows the combination designed by Mr. Henry Coxwell (an ardent supporter of Commander Cheyne's proposal). The three balloons connected in the manner shown in our engraving would carry six men, besides three tons weight of gear, boat-cars, stores, provisions, tents, sledges, dogs, compressed gas, and ballast. The triangular framework connecting the balloons would be fitted with foot-ropes, so that the occupants could go from one balloon to another in the same manner as sailors lie out upon the yards of a ship, and the balloons would be equipoised by means of bags of ballast suspended from this framework, and hauled to the required positions by ropes. Trail ropes would be attached to the balloons, so as to prevent their ascent above a certain height (about 500 feet), at which elevation they would be balanced in the air, the spare ends of the ropes trailing over the ice. The boat-cars would be housed in for warmth, and telegraphic communication kept up with the ships by means of a wire uncoiled from a large wheel (see sketch) as the balloons moved onward. This wire being marked at every five miles, would also serve to keep a record of the distance traversed. Commander Cheyne proposes that the balloons should start about the end of May, on the curve of a wind circle, of known diameter, ascertained approximately by meteorological observations conducted on board the vessel, and at two observatories some thirty miles distant in opposite directions. It is estimated that, with a knowledge of the diameter of the wind circle, and the known distance from the Pole, the balloons could be landed within at least twenty miles of the long-wished-for goal. There the balloons would be securely moored, and when the necessary observations at the Pole had been carried out, a return wind would be secured for their return, the requisite full inflation having been made by means of the surplus gas taken out in a compressed condition. The returning voyagers would arrest their course to the southward on the parallel of latitude on which they left their ship, and the remainder of the journey east or west, would be performed by means of the dogs and sledges conveyed in the balloons.

CAMPING OUT IN SCOTLAND

The incidents depicted in this engraving are thus described by the artist to whom we are indebted for the sketches:—"Given a camp at an elevation of between seven and eight hundred feet above the sea, in the coldest and rainiest district of Scotland, given only two days out of twenty-eight without torrents of rain, gales of wind, and an exceedingly low temperature; and a militia regiment acquires, during its month's training, a practical acquaintance with some of the worst hardships of actual warfare. Let us, in addition, 'house' the men in old, unserviceable tents—torn, worn, and leaky—and we have a state of things gravely detrimental to the health and comfort of the men, likely not only to interfere with the efficiency and discipline of the corps, but to seriously damage its recruiting prospects. The 2nd Royal Lanark Militia has recently been undergoing these experiences, and it is greatly to its credit that the patience, discipline, and good conduct of the men under such untoward circumstances have called forth special commendation."

The sketches from which our engraving is taken were made by an eye-witness, and are in no way exaggerated. Our artist very naturally questions the expediency of unnecessarily exposing any class of troops to such a trial, but we should imagine that there was no such intention on the part of the authorities, who probably ordered the regiment out, in expectation of fair weather, and after the deluge had commenced waited from day to day, hoping against hope for a favourable change until at last the whole month had elapsed.

"CELIA'S ARBOUR"

"THE REAPER AND THE FLOWERS"

Most persons are familiar with the touching German ballad, which, under the above title, has been so pleasingly Englished by Mr. Longfellow. In the picture before us the artist, Mr. P. R. Morris, has suggested the leading idea of the poem in a very effective allegorical fashion. At first sight we merely see a band of children, who in careless gaiety, and heedless of the scythe, form a chain to enclose an old labourer returning from mowing. But presently we see that beneath this superficial aspect of the scene there lies a deeper meaning. The old labourer affords a gaunt suggestion of Time or Death, who stays not with the young girls, but presses forward to overtake the crone tottering along in front. She leans heavily on a boy's shoulder, who pipes a melody as they go.

Mr. Morris, who is an A.R.A., was born at Devonport, December 4th, 1840. His father was an engineer and iron-founder. He began his artistic career under difficulties, as he ran away from his articles pursued by a warrant from his enraged employer. He subsequently became a student in the Royal Academy, where he took three silver medals and one gold medal; he also took the Prize of Rome for two years. Recently, he has been elected an Associate of the Royal Academy.

"NO HOPE"

This engraving is from a picture by Mr. Ferdinand Fagerlin, of Dusseldorf, which was exhibited recently at the Royal Academy. The scene represented is of a very affecting character, and there are few persons who will not appreciate its pathos. The doctor is announcing to the assembled family, to the mother of the sick man, to his wife, who leans half distraught against the door, and to the awe-stricken little girl, that the patient's speedy death is certain. The doctor is half-concealed from the patient by the door, and doubtless he speaks in a subdued tone, but the sick man, with senses preternaturally sharpened, interprets his thoughts, and the gleam of his eyes indicates that he is aware that sentence of death has been pronounced.

INCIDENTS OF THE MADRAS FAMINE

The latest news from the Madras Famine districts is decidedly the most cheerful that has yet been received. The rains had begun to fall copiously, and there was a reasonable prospect of an early alleviation of the present sharp distress, as there are now good grounds for hoping that the next harvest may be fairly abundant. But while the worst of the crisis is probably over, much still remains to be done. "A great famine," observe The Times, "like a great war, leaves distress in its track long afterwards, and it will be months yet before the feeble, the sick, and the dying will cease to be in need of help. The losses hitherto caused in the Madras Presidency by famine, and by disease consequent on famine, are very serious. The registered deaths of the present year up to the end of June were already 370,000 above the average, and this, it is said, does not represent more than two-thirds of the actual mortality, besides the deaths which have since occurred. Altogether, it is estimated that already not less than 750,000 persons have perished, either directly or indirectly, through the Famine."

Our engravings are from photographs taken by Captain W. W. Hooper, 4th Madras Cavalry, in the Bellary district, which lies in the western portion of the Madras Presidency. They tell their own sad tale. The collapse of the peasant farmer's last bullock, succumbing to the long-continued pangs of hunger, and now about to be attacked by vultures and other obscene birds of prey, before life is quite extinct, presents in itself a most melancholy spectacle; but the picture of the poor little skeleton-child left to die beneath the roots of a great tree is sadder still, and we can but express a hope that these engravings, which make the incidents of the Famine seem more a reality to us than any verbal descriptions can, will induce our readers to continue their donations to the Relief Fund, for assistance will be urgently needed for many months to come. We have before us some interesting accounts from the Times of India of the almost miraculous effects of the careful supply of food at the Relief Camps. Even those who are mere skeletons covered with wrinkles of discoloured skin frequently recover. As regards children, those who are heavy and dull, and look as if under the influence of a narcotic, generally die; while those who retain their sharpness and liveliness as a rule recover, even although they are mere skeletons. In some cases the hair falls off as the patients regain strength.

THE POONA BOAT CLUB

"At Poona," says Mr. Giles, to whom we are indebted for our sketch, "we have a very good club, both as regards members and appliances. The boats are built by English makers, such as Clasper, Searle, and others; the members have among them oarsmen who might take place in the first ranks at home. The scene is a curious one to a person accustomed to the Thames or any other English boating river. Instead of the stalwart boatmen of the Thames, the men who look after the boats, are natives, and it is a funny sight to see a delicate sculling boat handled by some swarthy Indians. In the background are the boat-houses built of thatch, and a weighing-machine at which the athletes can ascertain whether the effects of climate are increasing or diminishing their athletic frames. Between the boat-houses may be seen the vehicles which have brought the members of the club down to the water, and on the left of the sketch, the child in undress, and the goat, without which an Indian picture is rarely perfect. The palm trees and prickly pear bushes give an Oriental appearance to a scene which, viewed merely as to the boats and their occupants, would have a very English character."

HOME.

Political Affairs.——In this department there is little to record, Mr. Gladstone's speech last week in the Skating Rink at Nottingham being the most important item. He advised his hearers never to believe anything about him which might come from a Turkish quarter, and said that almost every day he received a letter from some one who had heard some "monstrous" statement about him—the last was that when he reduced the rates on light wines he was partner of a wine merchant, whom he greatly respected, but by whom he had never profited to the extent of a glass of wine. Referring to the cruelties alleged against the Turks and the Russians, Mr. Gladstone went on to say that his great desire was to find some effectual means of getting at the truth. The prevailing opinion was that the Turkish successes had been greater than those of their invaders, and if that were so, and the two parties were on equal footing in respect to cruelty and humanity, it would follow that the Turks must have the greater number of prisoners. Let Mr. Layard send home a return of them, and our ambassador at St. Petersburg send a similar return of the Turkish prisoners in the hands of the Russians, and then we should have a fair basis for judgment.

Civic Elections.——On Saturday the New Lord Mayor of London was elected, the usual formalities being observed. The choice of the Liverymen fell upon Aldermen T. S. Owden and Sir C. Whetham, and the Court of Aldermen decided in favour of the first-named gentleman. After the election a resolution was proposed to the effect "that in view of the high responsibilities of the office of Lord Mayor, the aldermanic veto is a valuable security for the dignity of the office," and was ultimately carried by a small majority, in spite of the opposition of Mr. Alderman Sidney, who asked the Liverymen if they thought that the Court should be fortified in their rejection of a candidate who had been several times returned to fill the highest civic office; and, referring to the election of Sir J. Bennett, said that the Ward of Cheap should be disfranchised if it was deemed incapable of electing a fit and competent man to fill the post of City Magistrate.—The newly elected Sheriffs of London and Middlesex are Mr. Alderman Nottage and Mr. Alderman Staples. The former is head of the firm known as the London Stereoscopic Company, and the latter was formerly proprietor of the Albion Tavern.—On Wednesday Sir J. Bennett and Mr. Breffit again contested the vacancy in the Ward of Cheap, the latter in his address to the electors disclaiming any personal feeling against his opponent, and saying that he had no complicity with the Court of Aldermen. The polling resulted in favour of Sir J. Bennett, the figures being 210 and 107.

Reopening of the Medical Schools.——The usual addresses were given at the various London hospitals on the opening of the session on Monday, most of the lecturers impressing upon the students the necessity of patient, intelligent, and continuous application, and cautioning them against the evil results of "cramming." At the London School of Medicine for Women Mrs. Garrett Anderson, M.D., delivered an address, in which she remarked that the real answer to the objections against the admission of women to the profession must be found in experience and not in argument, the latter being powerless against feeling and prejudice. She begged her hearers to remember how much depended upon the judgment, moderation, and good taste of the earliest supporters of a new cause, and how necessary it was, especially in England, that they should carry the feeling of the community with them. They should free themselves from petty jealousies, ignore everything which was opposed to comradeship, and seek in all things to promote the highest aims of the profession and to add to its honour.

General Grant will soon be leaving our shores, and he will certainly have no reason to complain of any coolness towards him on the part of the English nation. On Thursday last week before leaving Sheffield he was entertained by the Mayor and Corporation at a banquet in the Cutlers' Hall. On Friday at Stratford-on-Avon he was received with similar honour in the Town Hall, and was presented with an illuminated address in a carved casket made from Shakespeare's mulberry tree, Mrs. Grant being presented with a handsomely bound volume relating to Shakespeare. On Monday they went to Leamington, and on Tuesday to Southampton, where they will stay a week with their daughter, Mrs. Sartoris. Thence they will proceed to Torquay, and afterwards to Birmingham. This will bring their English tour to a close. They will then visit France and Spain, and afterwards cruise in the Mediterranean, the President of the United States having placed a vessel at the General's disposal for that purpose.

Miscellaneous.——The Conference of Librarians, which commenced on Tuesday at the London Institution, was attended by a large number of gentlemen from various parts of the United Kingdom, as well as some from the Continent and from America. Mr. T. Winter Jones, of the British Museum, was elected president, and his inaugural address was followed by the reading of several papers relating to "The Formation and Extension of Libraries," "Cataloguing," "The Admission of Fiction in Free Public Libraries," and other subjects. On Friday (yesterday) it was intended to propose the formation of an Association for the United Kingdom, and already the chief officers of eighty libraries in the Great Britain have joined the movement.—The War Office should really look after our artillery, both naval and military. A few days ago, while two blue-jackets of the Vesuvius were sitting in a dingy awaiting the rise of a spent torpedo in Porchester Creek a shot from the gunnery ship Excellent went clean through the boat. On another occasion a shot from the same ship fell on board the Oberon while the crew were at dinner; and on Friday last a village in Shropshire was bombarded by a battery of the Royal Artillery, no fewer than thirteen shells falling in the streets to the great astonishment and terror of the unoffending inhabitants. These "accidents" are said to have been the result of miscalculation as to range, and it is fortunate that neither of them resulted in loss of life or limb, though some damage appears to have been done to property.—The strike of the London masons and that of the joiners of Manchester still continue, and there is no hope of reconciliation. The cotton operatives at Bolton also hold out, although there is great misery in the district; many hundreds of young girls are homeless and destitute, and the religious bodies and some of the firms have begun to supply daily meals for them.—A Board of Trade inquiry into the loss of the Avalanche and Forest was commenced on Wednesday at the Wreck Commissioners' Court at Westminster.—The application made by the London School Board for the loan of a vessel to be placed in the Thames as a School Ship, has been refused by the Admiralty on the ground that the Government have none which they can spare.—Another improvement is about to be introduced by the Midland Railway Company, who are building some new carriages on the Pullman principle, for which ordinary first and third-class fares will be charged.

THEATRES

Mr. Gilbert's new farcical comedy, entitled Engaged, produced at the Haymarket Theatre on Wednesday evening, is a very amusing and very original production, but unfortunately it missed something of its effect from the shortcomings of the performers, who seemed hardly to have felt the peculiar vein of humour which runs through the piece. The notion of the author is that of making fun of strained sentiment, and of plots founded, like Mr. Collins's Man and Wife, upon such intricate and special matters as the peculiarities of Scotch law. For this purpose the sentiment of his personages is so intensely strained that it appears to be almost by a natural law of reaction that they are constantly being led into revelations of character of a less romantic kind; while his plot, though logically deduced from the peculiar circumstances of the case, becomes so complex, and so beset with logical dilemmas, as to tax the mind beyond all reasonable bounds. All this is extremely ludicrous; yet a purpose is steadily kept in view—the satire upon recent tendencies of our stage being obvious throughout. The principal performers are Mr. George Honey, Mr. Kyrle, Mr. Howe, Mr. Dewar, Miss M. Terry, Miss Lucy Buckstone, and Miss Emily Thorne. Generally the performance lacked that nicely calculated point of exaggeration which suggests the mock heroic and burlesque purpose; but from this objection we most certainly except Mr. Kyrle, who in the part of a mysteriously romantic gentleman, the victim both of an intense sensibility, and of a testamentary disposition which places him in very peculiar relations to the other personages of the story, afforded the audience genuine amusement.

The reopening of the Prince of Wales's Theatre has been attended by no greater novelty than the revival of Mr. Tom Taylor's comedy entitled An Unequal Match, which was originally produced at the Haymarket Theatre nearly ten years ago, and has since been frequently performed in town and country. It is almost needless to say that the performance at the Prince of Wales's is marked by a degree of care and refinement which has not been observable in some recent revivals of this neatly-constructed and dramatically-planned little play, in which the personages, though only well-known stage types, are cleverly contrasted, and the situations, familiar as they are, derive freshness from the treatment of a master hand. Mrs. Bancroft's Hester Grazebrook, the country girl who is suddenly raised by marriage to a position in society, is a delightful performance, though rather because Mrs. Bancroft is a delightful actress than from any special affinity between her talents and a part of that kind. Generally, indeed, it can hardly be said that the distribution of the parts is particularly happy—if we except Miss Litton's clever impersonation of Lady Montressor. This evening Mr. Tom Taylor's To Parents and Guardians will be added to the programme, the comedietta having been altered and arranged by the author for the occasion.

After a recess of some weeks the Strand was reopened on Saturday evening with a new comedy and a new burlesque. The former, which is adapted by Mr. F. C. Burnand from the well-known and amusing French piece Aux Crochets d'un Gendre, is entitled Family Ties, and depicts the sufferings which a newly-married man undergoes from his wife's parents. Bryce, the father-in-law, is such a selfish brute that the part is an unthankful one to play. It is excellently rendered by Mr. Horace Wigan, who is well supported by Miss Clouston Foster as the canting wife. Mr. J. G. Grahame, as usual, is a gentlemanlike and natural young husband; Mdlle. C. Dubois was a pleasing young wife, but perhaps a little too attitudinarian; Mr. Penley, as a silly youth who persistently follows Bessie Bryce about, caused a good deal of laughter; but by far the best character in the piece (with the conception of which Mr. Burnand we believe deserves to be credited) is that of the Baron Victor de Kamdec, a jovial young Frenchman, devoted to hunting, shooting, and racing, full of the most idiomatic English slang, and quite annoyed if anybody addresses him in French. The character is admirably depicted by M. Marius.—Champagne, a Question of Phiz, is a regular rollicking Strand burlesque by those experienced caterers Messrs. Farnie and Reece. The dresses and scenery are splendid, the dances vivacious, and the singing delightful. The dialogue is stuffed with excruciating puns, and the plot is rather less cloudy than that of burlesques in general. A cowardly Count sends his poet-laureate to the wars dressed in his own armour, and himself assumes the laureate's dress. While thus disguised he learns rather more about various "goings-on" in his own household than is perhaps quite agreeable. Champagne is not quite up to the mark of Nemesis; still, it deserves a pretty good run, for its absurdities are most spiritedly interpreted by Messrs. Cox, Penley, and Marius, and Mesdames Clermont, Dubois, and Venn.

A morning performance will take place at the Globe on Saturday, October 20th, at 2 P.M., on behalf of the Royal General Theatrical Fund, when will be produced for the first time these twenty years a revised version of Morton's comedy, Speed the Plough. The piece is strongly cast, and even the ploughboys, who have nothing to say, will be played by artists of celebrity.

The new piece at the Gaiety, entitled A Musical Box, is an adaptation by Mr. Burnand of Edmond Goodinet's farce entitled Le Homard, which was performed by the company of the Paris Vaudeville Theatre during their engagement under Mr. Hollingshead's direction last summer. Le Homard is an extravagant but amusing production; but, unfortunately, something of its fun has for obvious reasons been suffered by Mr. Burnand to disappear. The piece is, however, one of little pretension, and as it stands is as amusing as most farces. The leading parts are assigned to Mr. Terry, Mr. Royce, and Miss Eveleen Rayne.

St. James's Hall.—On the 24th ultimo Mr. Kennedy (who has already made a successful tour in the United States and the Colonies), assisted by his two daughters and three sons, commenced a short series of musical entertainments, interspersed with pleasing monologue, at the great St. James's Hall. The music consists of a selection of Scottish songs, most of which are familiar to English ears, and are sung with much spirit and great taste. Mr. Kennedy's description of the incident connected with each song is highly amusing and entertaining, and his singing is excellent. The young people show considerable musical talent by their effective rendering of glees, part-songs, and solos, and the Misses Kennedy are very proficient on the piano.

The Royal Amphitheatre in Holborn, which was converted last summer into a skating rink, is about to return to its original uses. It will reopen for dramatic performances this evening, when, a public announcement informs us, "James Taylor and Ada Alexander will appear in their great comedy-drama Simon."

Royal Park Theatre.——Madame St. Claire will take her first benefit on Monday, 15th inst., when she will appear as Romeo, Miss Blanche Lucan making her début as Juliet.

Special interest attaches to the production this evening of Lord Lytton's posthumous play entitled The House of Darnley at the Court Theatre. The work, as is well known, had not been completed by its author; hence Mr. Coghlan has, at the request of the present Lord Lytton, added a fifth act. We are not told whether the play remained unfinished owing to Lord Lytton's death, or whether the intention of completing it had been abandoned; but it is observable that the author of Money and The Lady of Lyons had produced no work for the stage for many years. From the title of the play it might be inferred that it is of an historical and romantic character, but this is described on contrary as "an original comedy of modern life." It was, we believe, upon the discovery that this play was in existence and in preparation at the Court that Mr. Hollingshead declined to carry out his intention of producing the classical play by Lord Lytton, founded on a comedy by Planché, for which negotiations had been completed. All things equal, there can be little doubt that English audiences prefer a play of English life.

SPORTING

The Turf.—It is evident that Turf pursuits are becoming more popular every year north of the Tweed, both the Kelso and Caledonian Hunt Meetings during the week having been decided successes. The former was honoured by the appearance of no less an equine celebrity than Hampton, who with 3 to 1 on him easily beat his two opponents, Strathmore and Glendale. At Musselburgh the combined Edinburgh and Caledonian Hunt gathering afforded capital sport, Glastonbury following up her recent success and winning the Hunt Handicap, and Con Cregan securing the Dalmeny Park Stakes for Lord Rosebery, who is one of the chief patrons of the meeting. In a field of twelve for the Trial Plate clever people made a fair shot in selecting Grandee as the winner, but he was beaten by a neck by Lord Lascelles's Cardinal's Niece. Nottingham, under the charge of Messrs. Ford, and supported as it is by the leading metallicians and many of the best men on the Turf, continues to hold a high place among the autumn fixtures. The chief handicap, however, only brought out six runners, of whom Queen Mary was made favourite. She came with an excellent reputation from Newmarket, and really won as she liked. She failed, however, on the following day to carry her penalty successfully in the Bradgate Park Plate, though she only succumbed to Niger (and F. Archer) after a splendid race by a head. The Bestwood Nursery attracted the good field of fifteen; but the calculations of more than one owner and backer were upset by something of a scrimmage among the horses at the turn of the course. The result was that the favourite, the Bourgogne colt, took no part in the finish, and Captain, who kept clear of the scrimmage, won. Mr. R. Howell, a local Turf celebrity, took the Welbeck Welter with Malphaquet, and the Woodborough Hurdle Race with Timbrel, much to the delight of the local "lambs" and others. Old Inglewood Ranger beat Cœruleus and four others for the Colwich Hill Stakes on the second day, and Truth took the Cotgrave Gorse Plate. The Rufford Abbey Nursery produced another good field; but Telegram's recent performance at Newmarket was so good that he was made first favourite at the short price of 6 to 4, though he carried a 7 lb. penalty, and had thirteen opponents to deal with. The race was never in doubt, as the favourite made all the running, and won by a length from Violet Melrose.—Speculation on the Cesarewitch shows most of the leading favourites to be steady, though Estelle and Balagny have beaten a retreat from the first rank. Hilarious still holds the pride of place, and justly so, considering his victory over Lady Golightly, to say nothing of other recent performances. If the race with Lord Falmouth's filly was truly run, and Hilarious continues in good health, it would seem that the Cesarewitch is something very like a certainty for him. It is plain, however, that owners and backers of several other horses, such as Prince George, Duchess of Cambridge, and Zucchero, are quite satisfied with their respective chances. It must not be forgotten that Zucchero was very heavily backed for the St. Leger by a stable which can hardly make a mistake when a horse is tried in earnest, and that be was known to be many pounds superior to his stable companion, who ran Lady Golightly to a head in the great Yorkshire race. Zucchero was going as well as any animal when the scrimmage took place, and, if he had not been interfered with, would certainly have beaten Lady Golightly. For the Cambridgeshire, Manœuvre, the stable companion just spoken of, is still first favourite at about 11 to 1. If we may venture the remark, it does not seem very long odds against Lord Bradford taking the double event. —That genuine good horse Thoro has met with an accident and broken his leg. Years ago a horse was at once destroyed under such circumstances; but now, as in Thoro's case, attempts are made to set the bones, the horse being kept off the ground in a sling.

Coursing.——At the Three Counties Union Club Meeting Mr. Back's Balfe and Mr. Deighton's Destruction divided the Spoonley Stakes (open), Mr. Dyas's Darius took the Adderley Cup, and Mr. Bartabee's Be Noble the St. Leger.

Golf.——The weather has been very fine in Scotland for this game, and the autumn meeting of the St. Andrew's Club went off with great éclat, Prince Leopold taking part in the competition for the King William IV. medal. Mr. Leslie Balfour secured the prize at eighty-nine strokes, and Mr. Mure Fergusson the club's gold medal at ninety-four. It is a matter of some little wonder that this game does not become more popular in England, though, of course, the difficulty in finding ground suitable for it has something to do with the matter.

Football.——Many lovers of the Association game will be glad to hear that an alteration of Rule 5 will have the effect of preventing players so often kicking into "touch." The long delays in the game will thus be materially reduced. The season, at least as far as the Rugby game is concerned, has commenced inauspiciously, as on the opening day on Clapham Common a broken arm, a broken leg, two badly-sprained ankles, and a dangerous concussion were among a long list of casualties.

Hunting.——The Queen's stag-hounds have commenced forest hunting, the first meet having taken place at Ascot on Tuesday last. Cub-hunting is in full swing all over the country, and the supply of foxes is generally reported to be good.

Pedestrianism.——A few remarks on Gale's walk will be found in "Topics of the Week."

Scraps

The St. Gothard Tunnel will probably be finished within three years, as the works are being actively pursued.

M. Thiers' Work on Philosophy has been left unfinished, and M. Barthelémy St. Hilaire states that he does not yet know whether it will be possible to publish the book.

The Grape Crop in California is so enormous this year that the growers are unable to turn it all into wine, as there would not be enough casks to hold it or a sufficiently ready sale.

Young Men's Christian Association.——The Lord Mayor will distribute the prizes to the successful students at the Evening Classes at this Association on Monday, Oct. 8, at seven o'clock.

The Grosvenor Gallery will reopen with a collection of drawings by Old Masters in addition to the exhibition of water-colours by deceased painters. The Queen will contribute a number of drawings from the Windsor Library.

Herrings have reappeared on the coast of Denmark after 300 years' absence. For centuries the herring fishery was an enormous source of revenue to the Danes, and it is now hoped that the industry will once more prove lucrative.

The Dundee Fine Art Exhibition opened on Monday. It includes about 1,100 pictures, some valuable sculpture with busts of numerous celebrities, and other objects of art. The Queen's contribution is Landseer's painting of "Sir Francis Chantrey's Studio."

Fresh Relics of Sir John Franklin are reported by the American Consul at St. John's, Newfoundland, who has bought from a sailor lately wrecked in Hudson's Bay two spoons marked "J. G. F." Some Esquimaux living near Repulse Bay had obtained the spoons from a native chief, at whose camp their owner, a white man, had died of scurvy.

A Horse-Cow.——There is now in a meadow opposite the residence of Mr. Barnard Morris, Little Codham Hall, Weathersfield, Essex, a singular freak of Nature in the shape of a colt in all respects of the nature of a horse, with the exception of one leg, which is that of a cow, having a small cloven hoof. We have ourselves seen this animal, which is about three months old, weakly, puny, and walking with difficulty.

Herr Wagner has not lost faith in his Bayreuth performances. He now proposes to found a School of Music at Bayreuth to educate the performers, and a "Patronage Association" has been formed to endow the school with a permanent fund of 5,000*l*. Members of this association are to pay a minimum annual subscription of 15*l*., and will alone have the right of presentation to the school, and of participation in the performances. Branch associations are also to be formed.

Cleopatra's Needle may be expected to reach England at the end of next week or the beginning of the following, if the weather prove favourable. The Cleopatra, in tow of the Olga, passed Malta on Thursday week, and was met afterwards by the Fouah, when seven miles east of the Island of Pantellaria. The Olga and her charge subsequently put into Algiers for coals. It is stated that the Cleopatra does not seem to answer her helm well, and will probably roll heavily in a high sea. On reaching Falmouth, she will be taken in charge by a Channel tug.

A New Cooking Apparatus has been invented for the Russian troops. It is fitted on a two-wheeled cart, and consists of a cylindrical pot with furnace and chimney, so arranged as to be always upright in spite of the severest joltings. The food is cooked by steam, and a single apparatus, in three hours, will supply a company of 250 men with ample stchi and oatmeal soup. As the kitchen only occupies half of the cart, uncooked food, plates, cups, &c., can be carried at the other end. Condensed forage is also supplied by three Russian manufactories, one at St. Petersburg turning out 30,000lbs. per diem. The forage is composed of small biscuits of oatmeal, pea flour, rye-meal, and ground linseed, and 28 biscuits form a single ration for a horse, containing as much nutriment as 12lb. of oats, and being about one-fifth of the bulk.

The Whale in the Westminster Aquarium died on Saturday morning, three days after its arrival. It was a white whale of the Beluga species, was ten feet long, weighed two tons, and was supposed to be about two-and-a-half years old. Taken sixteen months ago on the coast of Labrador, where it was cast ashore, the unfortunate creature had never since enjoyed a dip in sea water, as it was exhibited at New York in a fresh water tank, and came over to England in a bed of sea-weed, being soused every five minutes with a bucketful of sea-water. These impromptu baths probably gave the whale cold, as although it swam about freely when first placed in the Westminster Aquarium, and eagerly swallowed a number of eels after its thirteen days' fast, by Friday it experienced great difficulty in breathing, and died early next morning of congestion of the lungs. Notwithstanding this failure a fresh attempt will be made to bring over six five whales.

London Mortality increased last week, and the deaths numbered 1,237, against 1,179 in the previous seven days, but were 136 below the average, while the death rate rose to 18.3 per 1,000. The fatal cases of small-pox increased to 13 from 10, and of these 7 were unvaccinated, 3 vaccinated, and 3 not specified. There were 49 deaths from scarlet fever (a rise of 19), 22 from fever (a decrease of 9 and 18 below the average), 52 from diarrhœa (a decline of 19, and 38 below the usual return), 18 from whooping-cough, 16 from measles (a fall of 6), and 4 from diphtheria (a decrease of 4. Different forms of violence caused 52 deaths, of which 42 were the result of negligence or accident, including 22 from fractures and contusions. A centenarian, the widow of a carpenter, died in South Hackney. There were 2,410 births registered, an increase of 124, and 96 above the average. The mean temperature was 48·5 deg., and 6·2 deg. below the average, while the duration of sunshine was 19·7 hours out of the 83·1 hours during which the sun was above the horizon.

CHAPTER XI.

THE WAR, AND AFTER

THAT summer of 1854 was a long and dreary time. We were waiting for something to be done, and nothing was done. Good Hesvens! Were our generals stupid, or incapable, or were they dreaming away the time? Who does not remember the cholera at Varna, after the long and unnecessary delay, the sickness of the troops before a blow had been struck, and at last the embarkation for the Crimea? So great and terrible was the spectre of Russian greatness that even the three great Powers of France, Turkey, and England hesitated before attacking this monstrous Frankenstein in his den. They went at last, greatly daring, and their reward was—Alma.

And then followed the splendid months of barren victory—Inkerman, the soldier's battle, the foolish braggadocio of the Light Cavalry charge, followed by the cruel winter and the unmerited sufferings of the troops, for which a dozen commissariat officers ought to have been shot.

About this time I saw my compatriots, the Russians, for the first time. Some prisoners were brought to us; they wore flat caps and long coats, they had good-natured faces, not at all foolish; they had wide noses, like Tartars, and they made themselves quite happy and comfortable with us, carving all sorts of toys, and showing a power of laughter and humour quite incompatible with the devilry which we had been accustomed to attach to the Muscovite character. They were only devils, I suppose, by order of the Czar, and in the ranks. Outside the ranks as peaceable, docile, and quiet a set of fellows as ever wanted to grow an honest crop in peace.

But how we received the news in those days! With cheers, with illuminations, with feastings, with receptions of captains, generals, and admirals. Still the exodus of our juventus went on. The juvenes were younger, smaller, and more rustic in appearance. They all, however, had the same gallant bearing, these brave country lads, fresh from the plough and the stable, redolent of Mother Earth. A few weeks before, and they were leaning against posts in the village street, feeding pigs, driving calves, striding with a sideward lurch after cows, sitting almost mute on a bench in the village alehouse. Now they were well set up, drilled, inspired with warlike ardour, filled with new ideas of duty, responsibility, and a career, ready to do—and to die. Let us confess that the readiness to die is always qualified by that belief which every soldier has, that he, if no one else, will be the one person to escape. If it were not for that saving clause I fear that even in the times of greatest danger to the country service in the ranks would not be popular. Men did not volunteer for those charming fights in the arena before Nero, when all had to die on the ground. Quite the contrary; they disliked that kind of fight, and I have often thought how greatly the vivacity and ardour of the combat would have been increased if the combatants had been told beforehand that one—say the bravest—would have his life spared, with a pension of a shilling a day ever afterwards. Vos morituri salutant might have been said by those fresh-cheeked young English lads on their way to club muskets at Inkerman, and to fall in the storming of the Redan. And after a while they began to send the wounded home.

To receive them, a hospital was built in one of the meadows under the Ramparts, and a portion of the wall was railed off for the convalescents to walk upon. This made our own end at the Queen's Bastion still more quiet and secluded.

In 1856, the sick and wounded were brought home by every ship that arrived from the East, and week by week, sometimes daily, might be seen filing up the long and narrow street a long and dismal procession. It consisted of sailors carrying stretchers, four to every stretcher. There was no band now, nor would be any more for most of the poor men upon the stretchers, till the muffled drums and the fifes marched before the coffin and played the "Dead March." The townsfolk who had turned out to wave their handkerchiefs when the soldiers went away came out now to greet them back. But what a greeting! and what a return! Some, sitting half upright, waved feeble hands in response to those who lined the way and cheered their return. Their faces were pale and worn with suffering; sometimes a sheet covered the lower limbs, which were mutilated and crushed; some, a little stronger than their comrades, sat up, laughed, and nodded. Some, worn out by the rolling of the ship, the pain of their wounds, and the long sufferings of the campaign, lay back with closed eyes, patient and sad to see, and made no sign. And here and there one was borne along ghastly, the pallor of death upon his cheeks, life done for him; not even vitality enough left to think about the future world; his eyes half open, with a fixed glare which observed nothing. This, with the row of tombs in the Crimea and at Scutari, was the end of all that pride and pomp of war. What was it Tennyson said—

> The long, long canker of Peace is over and done.

We were to wake to nobler aims, leave the sordid and base, give up cheating, and strike home, were it but with the cheating yard measure.

Well. The war came, ran its course, and ended. What nobler ends followed? How much was abolished of the old cheating, the sordid aims, and the general baseness of a world at space? How much less wicked and selfish were we, when all the fighting was finished, and the soldiers come back to us?

And after all, we return to Celia's question, "What had they done to each other, the Russians and the English that they should stand face to face and fight?"

"Take me away, Laddy," Celia said one day, after seeing one of the gloomy processions of the wounded partly file past. "Take me away. I cannot bear to see any more. Oh! the poor soldiers—the poor soldiers——. What punishment can be great enough for the men who have brought all this misery upon the earth?"

What, indeed? But Nicolas was dead. General Février killed him. Perhaps, after all, he was not the guiltiest. But he gave the word. It is to be hoped, for their own sakes, that autocrats do not know what war means, else surely the word never would be given, even to save the throne, and every nation would manage its own affairs in quietness.

And yet England had to fight. It seems most true that the war could not be avoided. All that blood, all that suffering, the moans of so many thousands of wounded, the tears of so many thousands of women and children, the awakening of so many evil passions, the letting loose of so many devils, must fall upon the head of Russia. First to excite revolt among the Christian subjects of the Turk; then to make difficulties for the Turks in putting down the miserable victims of the Russian plot; then to call on Europe to mark how Turkey treated her subjects; then to proclaim herself the protector of Christians; this was Russia's game in 1828, in 1853, and, lastly, in 1876. And the glory of the poor soldiers? They died for their country, and have such glory as belongs to one of a nameless fifty thousand fallen on the field.

The fight was just and the victory righteous. We pay the penalty now of not having carried the war to its legitimate end. We should have restored Poland, driven Russia back to the Caucasus and the Caspian, given Finland again to Sweden, and taken away her southern ports. All this we could have done; it was possible to England and France, twenty years ago. Will the chance ever come again?

Through the whole of the war there was no man in the town who took a keener interest in it, who was oftener in the streets, who hung more about the harbour, or talked more with soldiers and sailors, than Herr Raumer.

The war, in any case, did good to our own people at the Dockyard town. There had never been such times since the good old long war, when a man who had a shop near the Hard had but to open it and stand all day taking the sailors' money as fast as they poured it out over the counter. Every ship that came home brought her sailors to be paid off, the money to be all spent in the town: every ship that sailed for the East carried away stores for the soldiers, chiefly bought in the town. Those who were in the way of all this money-making made fortunes out of it, and retired to suburban villas, with gardens, for the rest of their lives. I do not think that the green coffee berries, the putrid preserved meat, the mouldy compressed hay, or the biscuits that walked about animated by a multitudinous hive of lively creatures, were supplied by any of our people. We were too patriotic; we had friends on board the ships if not in the regiments—could we send them out rotten provisions or brown paper boots? Then there was the revelry. Out of all the millions spent in the Crimean War, think how many went in the drink-shops and the dancing kens. The fiddle of old Wassielewski, I know, was in constant request; often and often I heard the well-known sound—I know his style, which was distinct from that of any other of the sailors' musicians—from behind the red curtains of a sailors' public-house, behind which Jack and Jill were dancing, drinking, and singing. The China War, by the way, was long since played out, and the picture had given way to another in which Russians were playing an ignominious but dramatic part. A side picture represented French sailors and soldiers, very tight of waist, moustachioed, and black of hair, fraternising merrily with our own men,—with drink, hand-shaking, and song, they were celebrating the entente cordiale. Listen! It is the sailors' hornpipe; within is one who grave of face and agile of foot treads that mazy measure alone, while around are grouped the crowd of sympathetic rivals, who drink, applaud, and presently emulate. The dancer is facing old Wassielewski, who sits with outstretched left leg, his deep-set eyes fixed on the opposite wall, his thoughts far away in the dreadful past or the revengeful future, while the fingers obedient to his will play the tune that he orders, but does not listen to. It is, I know, because I do not look in, but feel all this, a low room, and it is redolent of a thousand compound smells, ancient, fish-like, capable of knocking a stranger down and stunning him with a single blow. The windows have never been open for twenty or thirty years; of course, once in a way, a pane was broken, and there were occasions when some young mariner, ashore after three years' cruise, was fain out of the plethora of his joy to find relief in smashing them all. But the smell of that room was venerable by age, and respectable by association, though more awful than it is permitted to me to describe. Jack and Jill did not mind it; they liked it. There was rum in it, plenty of beer, a very large quantity of tobacco, onions, beefsteaks, mutton chops, boiled pork and cabbage, pea soup, more tobacco, more rum, more beer. That smell, my friends, is gone; the public-house is gone, Jill is almost gone. Jack is an earnest Methodist by religion, and he spends his time ashore at the Sailors' Home.

And there then was the Dockyard with all its extra hands, and the work going on day and night, so that the solemn silence of the darkness was unknown. Victory Row must have lost one of its chief charms. For the whole twenty-four hours, there was the incessant tap-tap of the caulkers, the heavy thud of the steam-hammer, the melodious banging of the rivets, followed by countless echoes from the many-cornered yard, and the r—r—r—r of the machinery. No rest at all, except on Sunday. That emergency must be great indeed when the British Government would ask its workmen to give up their Sabbath rest.

As for the sailors, there seemed no diminution in their numbers, or in the number of the ships which crowded the harbour, and were perpetually coming and going with their thunder of salutes. Jack only had two stages: he was either just paid off, and therefore ostentatiously happy with his friends around him, his fiddlers, and his public-house; or he was just embarking again on a newly-commissioned ship, going off for another cruise with empty pockets, coppers terribly hot, and perhaps, if he was Jack in his youth, with the faint and dimly-seen ghost of a possible repentance somewhere lurking about his brain, a spectral umbra pointing heavenward which faded as the shore receded, and vanished about six bells in the morning.

For soldiers, we fell back upon the militia. We have never yet grasped the truth that England may have to defend what she has got; that she is not only the admiration, but also the envy, of all other nations; that Russia would like Constantinople and India; Germany, Australia—good heavens, think of the shame and ignominy of letting any un-English speaking country have Australia; the States, Canada; France, Egypt and Syria; Italy, Cyprus; Greece, Crete, and so on. When these facts have become convictions, when we fairly understand how great is our position in the world; what a tremendous stake we have in it; how much of unselfish humanity depends on the maintenance of English hegemony; then will England arm every man between fifteen and fifty, and make all from twenty to thirty liable to foreign service. Patriotism sleeps, but it may be awakened. If it continues to sleep, farewell to England's greatness. A century of ignoble wealth, a generation or two of commerce diverted, trade ruined, industries forgotten, and the brave old country would become worse than Holland because the English are more sensitive than the Dutch, and the memories of old glory combined with present degradation would madden the people and drive them to—the usual British remedy, drink.

In 1855 we—I do not speak as a Pole—were rather better off in the matter of regiments and recruits than we should be in 1877, were the occasion to arise. In all these years, we have learned nothing, taken to heart nothing, done nothing, prepared for nothing. We have no larger army, we have no better organisation, we have no more intelligent system, we have not made our officers more responsible. Twenty years ago, we threw away twenty thousand men—with a light heart sent out twenty thousand men to die because we had no system of control, transport, and commissariat. All these poor lads died of preventable disease. What have we done since to make that impossible again? Nothing. Talk. At the very Autumn Manœuvres, when we have weeks to prepare and a paltry ten thousand men to provide for, we break down. Continental nations see it, and laugh at us. What have we done to make our children learn that they must fight pro patriâ, if occasion arise? Nothing. Board Schools teach the Kings of Israel; the very atmosphere of the country teaches desire of success and the good things which success brings with it; no school teaches, as the Germans teach, that every man is owed to his country. That may come; if it does not come soon, farewell to England's greatness. Again: that the Empire was created and grew great, not by truckling to the pretensions of modern diplomatists, but by saying, "Thus far, and no farther." Do this wrong or that, and you will have to fight England. That the most glorious country that the world has ever seen, the finest, the richest, the most splendid, the most religious, the least priest-ridden and king-ridden, was made what it is by its children being willing and able to fight—all these things were not taught in 1855, and are not yet taught in 1877. Good heavens! I am a Pole, and yet more than half an Englishman: and it makes me sick and sorry to feel how great is the patrimony of an Englishman; how noble are his annals; how profound a gap would be made in the world by the collapse of England; and how little English people seem to understand their greatness. I have been waiting for twenty years to see the fruits of the Crimean War—and, behold, they are dust and ashes in the mouth.

Revenons à nos moutons. Our garrison, then, consisted of a couple of militia regiments. They came to us, raw country lads, like the recruits whom we sent to the East, but, being without the presence of the veterans to control and influence them, they took longer to improve. And yet it is wonderful to notice how an English lad takes to his drill and tackles his gun from the very first, with an intelligence that is almost instinct. He is, to be sure, almost too fond of fighting. There is no other country beside England, except France, where the recruits can be taught to march, to skirmish, and the rest of it, without the aid of Sergeant Stick, so largely employed in the Russian, German, and Austrian services. These young fellows came up to barracks, with their country lurch upon them, their good-natured country grin, and their insatiable thirst for beer. They retained the last, but in a very short time got rid of the first. One whole regiment volunteered for foreign service—I forget what it was—and went to Corfu, the island which a late Prime Minister, more careful of a theory than of a country's prestige, tossed contemptuously to Greece, so that all the world sneered and even the gods wondered. Well; these rustics of militia men, I declare, after a few weeks were as well set up, pipe-clayed, and drilled, as any regiment of the line, and as trustworthy in case their services should be required.

In one thing, one must needs confess, they were inferior to the regulars. It was not in perpendicularity, which they easily acquired. We were still in the pipeclay days, when the white belt and the cross shoulder-straps were daily stiffened by that abominable stuff; the white trousers of summer had also to be kept in a whited sepulchre semblance of purity by the same means; a man who is pipeclayed cannot stoop; the black leather collar kept the head at an unbending line with the body; and the yellow tufts on the shoulder, with the swallow-tails of the absurd regimental coat and the tiny ball of red stuff on the regimental hat, all combined to necessitate a carriage ten times stiffer and more rigidly upright than in these degenerate days. The most lopsided and lurcher-like of rustics was bound to become perpendicular. But their failing was in the way they took their beer. The old regular got drunk as often as the militiaman, but the drunker he got the stiffer he grew, so that when he was quite helpless he fell like a lamp-post, with uncompromising legs. And we, who knew by experience how a soldier should fall, remarked with sorrow rather than anger that the militiaman fell in a heap like a ploughboy, and so betrayed his customary pursuits.

CHAPTER XII.

THE BRAMBLER FAMILY

This was an especially good time for Ferdinand Brambler, the journalist, and consequently for the children. Such years of fatness had never before been known to them. Not, it is true, that Fortune befriended Augustus. Quite the contrary. War might be made and peace signed without affecting his position in the slightest. Nothing ever happened to better his position. On one occasion, even,—I think it was in 1856—he received an intimation from Mr. Tyrrell's head clerk, who had vainly trusted him with some real work, that his resignation would be accepted if he sent it in. Therefore, with enthusiasm ever equal to the occasion, he hastened to desert the Legal, and once more returned to the Scholastic, taking the post of writing and arithmetic master in a Select Commercial Academy.

"After all," he said to me, "the Scholastic is my real vocation. I feel it most when I go back to it. To teach the rising generation—what can be nobler? I influence one mind, we will say. Through him, I influence his six children; through them their thirty-six children; through them again their two hundred and sixteen—there is no end to the influence of a schoolmaster. I shall be remembered, Mr. Pulaski, I shall be remembered by a grateful posterity."

Perhaps he will be remembered, but his chances of exercising permanent influence were scanty on this occasion, because, although he taught with extraordinary zeal and activity, the Principal actually complained, after three months, that his boys were learning nothing, and gave him notice in the friendliest and kindest manner.

Some secret influence was probably brought to bear upon Mr. Tyrrell at this juncture, when the Brambler household threatened to lose the income derived from the labour of its chief, because Augustus went back to his old office and his old pay, sitting once more cheerfully among the boys, mending the pens with enthusiastic alacrity, serving writs with zeal, copying out bills of costs with ardour, and actively inspecting old books in an eager search for nothing.

"I do think," he said, in a burst of enthusiasm, "that there is nothing after all like the Legal. When you have deserted it for a time, and go back to it, you feel it most. Law brings out the argumentative side—the intellectual side—of a man. It makes him critical. Law keeps his brain on the stretch. Often on Saturday night I wonder how I have managed to worry through the work of the week. But you see they could not get on without me."

Perhaps not, but yet if Augustus had known by whose fair pleading he was received back to become a permanent incubus on the weekly expenses of that office——

In the Scholastic, in the Clerical, or in the Legal, Augustus Brambler never changed, never lost heart, never failed in zeal, never ceased to take the same lively and personal interest in the well-being of the House. He had his punctual habits and his maxims. He was a model among employés. Fortune, when she gave Augustus a sanguine temperament and a lively imagination, thought she had done enough for the man, and handed him over to the Three Sisters as sufficiently endowed to meet any fate. And they condemned him to the unceasing and contented exercise of illusion and imagination, so that he never saw things as they really were, or understood their proportion.

But during the years of war the children, in spite of their helpless father, waxed fat and strong, and even little Forty-six looked satisfied and well fed.

It was through the exertions of their Uncle Ferdinand.

I had long observed that whenever anything was going on—and something in these days was constantly going on—Ferdinand, besides Herr Raumer, was always on the spot. Whatever the nature of the ceremony, whether it was the embarkation of a regiment or the arrival of the invalided, or a military funeral, or an inspection of troops upon the Common, or a launch, Ferdinand was in attendance and to the front, wearing a face of indescribable importance, and carrying a notebook. This in hand, he surveyed the crowd on arrival, and made a note; cast a weather eye upwards to the sky, and made a note; drew out his watch and made a note; then as soon as the Function began he continued steadily making notes until the end. I did not at first, being innocent of literary matters, connect these notes with certain descriptions of events which regularly appeared on the following Saturday in the local Mercury. They were written with fidelity and vigour; they did justice to the subject; they were poetical in feeling and flowery in expression. A fine day was rendered as "a bright and balmy atmosphere warmed by the beams of benevolent Sol"; a crowded gathering gave an opportunity for the admirer of beauty to congratulate his fellow-townsmen on the beauty and tasteful dress of their daughters; when a ship was launched, she was made by a bold and strikingly original figure to float swanlike on the bosom of the ocean; when a public dinner was held, the tables groaned under the viands provided by mine eminent host of the George; the choicest wines sparkled in the goblet; animation and enthusiasm reigned in every heart; and each successive flow of oratory was an occasion for a greater and more enthusiastic outburst of cheering. The writer was not critical, he was descriptive. That is the more popular form of journalism. Froissart was the inventor of the uncritical historian. And Ferdinand was born either too early or too late.

For all these beautiful and gushing columns, invaluable to some antiquary of the future, were due to the pen of Ferdinand Brambler, and it was by the frequency of the occasions on which his powers were called for that the prosperity of the Bramblers depended. And Ferdinand, an excellent brother and the most self-denying creature in the world, worked cheerfully for his nephews and nieces. Beneath that solemn exterior, and behind those pretensions to genius, there beat the most simple and unselfish of hearts.

Ferdinand did not report; first, because he could not write shorthand, and, secondly, because he thought it—and said so—beneath the dignity of genius to become the "mere copying clerk of Vestry twaddle." He lived on his communiqués, for which, as he was the only man in the place who wrote them, and therefore had the field all to himself, he received fairly good pay. During the Crimean War he had a never-ending succession of subjects for his pen, which was as facile as it was commonplace. It was the history of the regiment; it was a note on the next roster; it was the service roll of a ship; it was the biography of a general; nothing came amiss to the encyclopædic Ferdinand; and whatever he treated, it must be owned, was treated with the same hackneyed similes, the same well-worn metaphors, and the same pleasantries; for, while Augustus looked on life through the rosy glasses of a sanguine imagination, Ferdinand regarded things from the standpoint of genius. He wrote for a provincial weekly paper; nothing higher would take his papers; he was not the editor; he was not even on the regular salaried staff; he was a mere outsider, sending in articles on such topics as occurred to him; but in his own imagination he wrote for posterity. Like Augustus he believed in himself. And just as Augustus assumed in the family circle the air of one who unbends after hard intellectual labour, so Ferdinand when he emerged from the ground floor front, which was his study, and contained his library, moved and spoke with the solemnity of one with whom his genius was always present.

From 1853 to 1857 the family flourished and grew fat. For after the Russian War was finished, and the Treaty signed—to be broken as soon as the semi-barbaric Muscovite thought himself strong enough—there arose in the far East another cloud. I have often wondered whether the Indian Mutiny, like the late Bulgarian insurrections, was got up by Russian agents, and, if so, I have reflected with joy upon the maddening disappointment to the Tartar that it did not happen just two years before.

We had achieved Peace, not a very glorious peace, because we ought to have driven Russia back to the Caucasus as a frontier before any peace was thought of, but still peace, and with the memory of those three years upon us, the sufferings of our troops, the unpreparedness of England, the rascality of contractors, and the inefficiency of our officers, we were glad to sit down and rest. How have we profited by the lesson of twenty years ago? What security have we that on the next occasion, when our men are ordered out again, the same things will not happen again—the green coffee, the putrid preserved meat, the shoddy coats, the brown-paper boots, the very powder adulterated?

Peace! Well, we had fought two or three gallant battles, been jealous of our gallant allies, killed an immense number—say, altogether, with those who died on the march, and those who died of disease, and those who died in the field, about half a million of Russians, fifty thousand Englishmen, double the number of French, and the same number of Turks; we had put a sudden end to Tennyson's "long canker of peace," and made it war—first for righteous reasons, and then for the lust of blood and battle, the red-sheeted spectre which rises when the trumpet sounds and fires the blood of peaceful men. As for the morality at home, as I asked in the last chapter, were we the better?

Then came the Indian Mutiny. For a while it seemed as if the very foundations of the Indian Empire were shaken. And at no time were the hearts of Englishmen more stirred in the whole of England's history than by the tales of massacre and murder which came by every ship from the East. The troops which had enjoyed a brief year of rest were hastily re-embarked: the flags which bore the names of Alma, Inkerman, and Balaclava were carried out again to get the names of Lucknow and Delhi; but the men who marched out in '54 with the sturdy look of men who mean to fight because they must, went out now with the face of those who go to take revenge because they can. It was a war of revenge. And, whatever the provocation, it was a full and even a cruel measure of revenge that the British soldiers took. We were growing sick of "history," Cis and I. We waited and watched while the red coats went and came; wanted to go on without excitement with our music and our reading, and we longed for peace.

"The Lord," said the Captain, "gives us peace, and the Devil gives us war. Until the nature of men is changed, there will be peace and war in alternate slices like a sandwich. In good times the sandwich is meaty. Meantime, let us keep up the Fleet."

We came to the spring of 1858. Mr. Tyrrell was Mayor for the second time. It was the year when Leonard should return,—five years on June the twenty-first, Celia looked at me sometimes, and I at her. But we said nothing because we understood what was meant. And one day I surprised the Captain in Leonard's room. He was opening drawers, arranging chairs, and trying window blinds. "All ship-shape, Laddy, and in good order. Don't let the boy think the vessel has got out of trim after all these years."

The Mutiny was over, the punishment had been inflicted, and our town was now comparatively quiet. No more hurried preparation of armaments and despatch of ships. Things became flat, the people who had not already made fortunes out of the war saw with sorrow that their opportunity was past, the extra hands at the Dockyard were discharged. And the town became quiet again. It was bad for all who had to earn their bread—even I felt the change in a falling-off of pupils—and it was especially bad for poor Ferdinand Brambler.

I met him one day walking solemnly away from the Yard, notebook in hand. I stopped to shake hands with him, and noticed that his clothes were shabby, his boots worn at the heel, his hat ancient, and his general get-up indicating either the neglect of outward appearance peculiar to genius or a period of financial depression. While I accosted him his brother Augustus passed by. He, too, was in like pitiable guise. And he looked pinched in the cheeks, albeit smiling and cheerful as ever.

"What will it run to, Ferdinand?" he asked anxiously.

"I should say," said Ferdinand with hesitation, "unless I am disappointed, mind, which I may be, I should say it will be a pound of tea, the greengrocer's bill, and something to Forty-seven's new shoes."

"The wife did say," replied Augustus, "that the children's breakings out are for want of meat. But if we can't have meat we can't. Awfully busy at the office, Ferdinand. Money pouring in. Nothing like the Legal."

Poor Ferdinand, who by long struggling with the family wolf had got to look on everything he wrote as representing payment in kind, was right in being proud of his profession, because he had nothing else to be proud of. It was not in quiet times a lucrative one, and I should think, taking one year with another, that this poor genius, who really loved literature for its own sake, and with better education and better chances might have made something of a name, received from his profession about as much as his brother in the Legal, and that was sixty pounds a year.

I repeated this conversation to the Captain at dinner. He became silent, and after our simple meal proposed that we should go for a walk. By the merest chance we passed the Bramblers' house.

"Dear me," said the Captain, "the very people we were speaking of. Suppose we pay our respects to Mrs. Brambler."

The poor mother was up to her eyes in work, her endless children round her. But the little Bramblers did not look happy. They wore a pinched and starved look, and there was no disguising the fact that they were breaking out. Forty-eight scowled at us with rebellious looks; Forty-six was wolfish in hungry gaze, and even the mild-eyed Forty-four looked sad.

Mrs. Brambler read the pity in the Captain's eyes, and sat down, bursting into tears, and throwing her apron over her face. The elder girls stole to the window and sobbed behind the curtain—the younger children sat down every one upon what came handiest, and all cried together. They were a very emotional family.

"So—so," said the Captain, "we were passing—Laddy and I—and we thought we would drop in—thought—we—would—drop—in. Come here, Forty-six——Does this boy, do you think, Mrs. Brambler, have enough nourishment?"

"Augustus does all he can, Captain, and so does Ferdinand, I'm sure. But there was the rent, and we behind with everybody—and—and—sometimes it's most too much for me," "We dropped in," repeated the mendacious Captain, "to invite the children to tea and supper to-night——"

"Hooray!" cried Forty-six, dancing about; and the faces of all lighted up with a sunshine like their father's.

"It's only your kindness, Captain. You don't really want them."

"Not want them? Where is Forty-four? Come and kiss me, my dear. Where is your colour gone? Not want them? Nonsense. Nothing but shrimps and periwinkles, and water-cress, perhaps, for tea; but for supper—ah!—eh! Laddy, what can we do in the way of supper? What's in the larder?"

"A leg of mutton, a beefsteak, and a pair of chickens," I replied. "I think that is all."

The larder was, in fact, empty, but this was not a time to parade the vacuum.

"You see, Mrs. Brambler; much more, very much more, than we can possibly eat. Friends in the country. And we did think that the steak for supper——"

"Ah!" cried Forty-six, irrepressibly.

"With the leg of mutton for yourself and the pair of chickens——"

Mrs. Brambler laughed through her tears.

"There—go along, Captain," she said. "We know.—But if it wouldn't trouble you, the children shall go and welcome."

"Very lucky, Laddy," said the Captain, in the street, "that the larder is so full. Let us call at the butcher's as we go home."

I ventured to mention to Herr Räumer the distressed condition of the family with whom he lodged.

"I know it," he said, helping himself to a glass of Hock. "I have seen for some time that the children were not properly fed. It is a pity. A good many children about the world are in the same plight."

"Help them," I said, sententiously, "when you can."

He shrugged his shoulders, and laughed.

"I am past sixty. I have seen so much distress in the world that I have long since resolved to help nobody. The weakest goes to the wall in this best of all possible worlds. If it is not the best it is not my fault, because I did not make it. Every man for himself, as you will say at sixty if you are honest. This is a comfortable chair, this is good Hock, this is excellent tobacco. Why should I trouble myself because people are starving in the room below us any more than because they are starving in China, which is a good many miles off? Pity and charity are excellent things in the abstract. Applied to individuals actually before you they are disquieting. Allons, cher Ladislas, soyons philosophes."

He was a man of infinite pity in the abstract, wept over any amount of woe served up in the yellow paper covers of a French novel, but in the presence of actual suffering he was callous. "Every man for himself." Since I have grown older I have learned to distrust many a philanthropist whose sympathies grow deeper the farther they reach from home.

"And now," he went on, changing the position of his legs, "Let us be cheerful, and talk of Celia. Pretty, delicate, little Celia. Tall and gracieuse Celia. Choice and delicious Celia. She is a credit to you, Ladislas Pulaski. Her husband will thank you. I drink her health. Ah! The English girls. . . . After all, we must grant these islanders some superiority. They are stupid, ignorant, and prejudiced. They call Continental diplomacy bad names, and are going to ruin themselves because they will not have secret service money. But their girls—their girls are charming. And the most charming of them all is Celia."

ON THE TOP OF A COACH

> Here it comes,
> With five at top; as quaint a four-in-hand
> As you shall see—three piebalds and a roan.
> TENNYSON

THE present generation, which turns out on a fine summer afternoon to witness the well-appointed vehicles of the Coaching Club leave the Magazine, can gain but a faint idea of the bygone pleasures of a coach and four. The faultless equipages and splendid horses to be seen at such a time are a striking exhibition of English taste and wealth, but the whole affair lacks the exhilaration which but one coach and four could produce amongst our forefathers. Certainly the costly spectacle does not reproduce in the mind of Paterfamilias the coaching scenes familiar to his youth. He thinks sadly of the expectant knots gathered round the Blue Boar in some country village towards dusk, the commotion caused in its one long street as the Highflyer cantered down it with a heavy load of outsiders, the plethoric coachy, only his nose visible above his bird's-eye fogle, and the merry tantara which Oxford Joe, the guard, blew from the back seat. And then the greetings which ensued as the coach pulled up, the cheerful rattle of the harness as the fresh team was led out of the yard, and the fight which immediately followed before the new off leader could be induced to start, when "all the resources of the establishment," from the head waiter to the ostler's boy, the warming-pan, and the dog-whip, the double-barrelled imprecation, and the simple "You hussy!" kicks, thumps, dragging, and whipping failed to make the least impression until the ostler seized her by the ears, when she went off like a lamb. All these and many more delightful memories rise to the minds of those long ago familiar with coaching. Alas! these sights and sounds dear to youth have fled before the screech of the express train as mediæval ghosts trooped homewards at cockcrow. Occasionally the traveller of days which seem almost prehistoric to the present generation—who dwells with fondness on even those stifling inside passages when he was crammed in with three fat women and four squalling children for a drive of forty miles, or on those equally terrible night journeys on the outside, when some unlucky wight overborne by sleep fell off, and others found themselves frozen to the seat as the coach drew up on a cheerless Christmas dawn for breakfast—occasionally such an ancient traveller comes upon some pleasing memento of the bye-gone era. He sees Swinton, the familiar "coachy" of the great North Road, haunting some hostelry dear to him in the long-past days of brandy and water ad libitum. In York the old-fashioned placard still meets his eye of the coach that started in 1706 "from the Black Swan, Holborn, and the Black Swan, Coney Street, York, every Wednesday morning at 5 A.M. to do the journey in four days (if God permits), each passenger allowed 14 lbs. of luggage, 3*d.* every additional lb." As for highwaymen and their attacks, even the fathers of the present generation only know them from their stage counterfeits, and from cheap books of the Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin style. In the retired parts of Devon and Cornwall beyond railways, real coaches sometimes horsed with the orthodox four are actually to be found, and on them a man can reproduce the old days to himself while being rapidly whirled through beautiful scenery in summer sunshine. Who that has wandered through Dartmoor, and mused over the ruined British village of Grimspound, can forget the shock which the four-in-hand, crammed inside and out with dusty tourists, caused him as it drove along the central road of the Moor through his speculations, like the foul commercial spirit of the nineteenth century, putting to flight the fair reconstructions of archæology? Most men, too, must have lively reminiscences of the coaches in the Lake district—how they swept past them in a cloud of dust with a freight of supercilious outsiders "personally conducted" through the finest scenery, while they were slowly tramping onwards under a knapsack. Yet these coaches somehow do not impress us with the notion that they are genuine survivals. Most of them are taken off the road in winter. They come into existence from the exigencies of holiday traffic, and when the cold weather sets in, and tourists flee together with the swallows, they too retire into congenial darkness, and, under rough sheds in inn-yards, become fowl-roosts until the next summer. It is to Scotland that the traveller must go if desirous to experience the old glories of coaching, and even there steam is rapidly driving the stage-coach further into the wilds as the white man does the Indian. There are several routes where scenery of great beauty may be enjoyed, independently of the practical end which a Highland coach invariably lays itself out for—the easy transport of tourist or sportsman from one district to another.

From the outside seats, on the contrary, of one of the amateur coaches which run from London during the season, life is only seen in its holiday guise. The Guildford or Dorking coach carries a guard and keeps time; but no one could mistake it for a commercial venture. People take seats on such a coach to enjoy the fine weather, to drive down, it may be, to an evening with the Orleans Club, and everything takes its colour from the holiday-maker's own mood. The children playing at the cottage doors as the four silken-coated bays sweep by look very picturesque; but the traveller has not time to notice their dirty faces, or to hear the baby squalling in the cradle inside. Edwin and his Angelina, walking amid the roses of their suburban villa, readily weave themselves into a rustic idyll. It is perhaps as well that he cannot hear what they are arguing about—the respective merits of onion sauce versus capers with boiled mutton. All base culinary and sublunary cares are, however, singularly out of place on the top of a coach. Though black Care sits behind the horseman, he can never abide the exhilarating influences of the box-seat. The top of a coach is the best modern substitute for the wonderful horse of Arabian fable, which, on a wooden peg being withdrawn from his shoulder, forthwith rose into the air, and bore his rider into the realms of space.

It cannot be denied, however, that the moral effects of viewing life from the top of a coach have a tendency to exalt Self, and bid us look down upon our neighbours. It is true that first-class railway travelling is likely to cherish the same feelings, as the traveller surveys from his easy cushioned seat the perspiring multitudes crammed into the third-classes at his side. But while the comfortable isolation of the one keeps up the distant reserve of the national character, the free air, rapid motion, and mixed company on the top of a coach prove salutary correctives, and merely put a man on good terms with himself and his neighbours by giving him a becoming sense of his own superiority to outward nature. So the gentleman from Bradford could see nothing in the Lakes as he was whirled by them on the top of a coach but "reservoirs." Did the promoters of the scheme to supply Manchester with water from Lake Thirlmere survey that lake from the outside of a coach?

THE READER

"ON HORSEBACK THROUGH ASIA MINOR," by Capt. Fred Burnaby (S. Low and Co.).—A winter ride along the roads—if roads they may be called—that lead from Scutari through Sivas and Erzeroum to Van, thence round by Kars and Ardahan to Batoum on the sea, would have few charms for travellers averse to broken limbs and touches of rheumatic fever. To the hero of a "Ride to Khiva," detained in England all the summer season by regimental duties, these petits désagréments may even have acted as a partial provocative. In other respects the time was rather tempting. If Stamboul was still puzzling itself with guesses as to the issues of the Conference, Asia Minor was already simmering with eagerness for war. Hardy Redifs and older Mustafiz—for in some districts the arrière ban was even then being summoned to the field—were gathering round the standard of the Prophet, some sober and sad of cheer, some full of ardour, even bursting into tears when told they must be left behind. Mudirs and Caimacans were reckoning up the resources of their districts; Stamboul-appointed Pashas devising military and sanitary measures to be carried out, like the fortification of the hill that commanded Ardahan, "when the winter was gone;" Circassians fresh from Roumelia, or from the Black Sea settlements, boasting their desire to cross swords once more with their ancient enemy; Kurds offering their services to Ismail Pasha, or waiting (on the Persian frontier) to join the stronger side; atrocity-mongers beginning to make capital of the imaginary excesses of a Pasha at Sivas, or the equally ideal plunder of the bazaar at Van by a regiment of most peaceable Redifs. To a military traveller, attended with all the prestige that attached just then to an English officer in Anatolia, the journey, despite all the drawbacks of scanty fare, bad lodging, and tracks saddle-deep in snow, and fringed with most uncompromising precipices, must have possessed no ordinary attraction. And Capt. Burnaby has eminently the gift of vivid description, of taking, in his own phrase, "verbal photographs" of scenes and districts, so like and yet in many things so different—some, scarce recovered from the famine of the other year; some, peaceful lands, where Turk and Armenian, Moslem and Christian, live side by side in perfect amity; some again, provinces where the Christian cannot be safely trusted to bear arms, or where well-matched Kurd and Circassian dispute the upper hand, to the sore discomfort of the more quietly disposed. The country Caimacan, often it would seem a well-meaning and energetic man, the more polished Pasha with his political talk that sounds like extracts from last year's Pall Mall Gazette, the Polish or Hungarian refugee, the gipsy dancing-girls, the Kurdish mountaineer, the Yezeed "devil-worshipper," the veteran officer of Cretan, Yemen, or Montenegrin wars, come out one after the other in most amusing outlines. Nor is Capt. Burnaby less quick to catch the military features of the country as he rides—the strong position, for instance, of Sivas, commanding as it does the descent to the central plateau, the passes beyond Erzeroum towards Ardahan and Bayazid, or the importance of this last as opening the way for an advance on Syria. Very amusing as a tale of travel, his volumes are equally full of interest for the student of the war who would like to know how matters stood just before the war began, to trace the dilatoriness which resulted at its outset in the loss of more than one naturally impregnable position, or to hear of cheery old Kohlman, "the hero of Zewin," and the smartness of the troops at Batoum, where Russia met with her first check. As a book with a political bias it is somewhat less satisfactory. Capt. Burnaby's pronounced "Russophoby" is of the kind which leads to the abnormal use of capital letters, to the repetition again and again of instances of Russian atrocity which, on turning from the curiously minute table of contents to the text, one finds to be the same incident restated, to exaggeration of roadside talk and hearsay evidence into a formal indictment of the Russian armies. Gravely as Russia may have erred—and through her agents she has doubtless erred—in stirring up for selfish or sentimental aims revolts which could only end in massacre, it is idle to compare her worst Cossacks with the irregulars of the Porte. Even, indeed, the cruelties reported from Shumla by Consul Reade have turned out, we believe, on later inquiries, to be the work not of Russian, but of Bulgarian malefactors. Of Turkish Government in Anatolia, or rather, we should say, of its personnel, Captain Burnaby gives a not unfavourable impression. Pashas and Caimacans have clearly many good points, and would be better in practice than they are but for the system which has given Angora, for instance, ten Pashas in four years, and which shifts a good man just as he becomes acquainted with his work. A Government, in short, "feckless" and careless rather than deliberately bad, and one which it may be worth noting neither resident American missionaries nor leading Armenians seem desirous of exchanging for the protection of the Czar under Russian or even Armenian officials. Of the copious appendices on military routes to Syria and the further East—Captain Burnaby was far from anticipating the Turkish successes in the campaign—we have no space to speak. The narrative is certainly most spirited and entertaining, with a delightful undercurrent of comedy in the relations of the traveller's English soldier servant to his Turkish attendants, the first a sanctified Moslem from Stamboul, the second an honest Anatolian Redif. Whether it deserves still higher praise is a point on which there might be some difference of opinion.

"Preventive Medicine and Public Health," or a reprint of "Lectures delivered at St. Thomas's Hospital and elsewhere," by Dr. Alfred Carpenter (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.), is a valuable addition to our popular books on sanitary science. It comprises addresses on zymotic diseases and disinfectants, with especial reference to the hopelessness of our attempts to disinfect, say, a "cartload of dung with a few ounces of a disinfectant," or to flush a large sewer with a gallon or two of liquid; on air and germs, mode of ventilating rooms, and production of ozone;—on pure water and its sources, value and use of filters, and possible supply of London from the surrounding chalk downs; on the disposal of sewage, and on the work of sewage farms. On this last subject Dr. Carpenter, from his seventeen years' experience of the Beddington sewage farm, can speak as quite a practical authority. Starting from the principle that true sewage utilisation rests on the powers of certain plants—of rye grass more especially—to "assimilate animal matter without that matter being first resolved into its ultimate elements," he combats with much vigour the popular objections that animal matter, if given in excess, may be taken up by the plants without being transformed, that the products of sewage farms are not yet proved to be sanitarily safe, or their effluents free from danger to the neighbourhood, while from comparison of the Beddington accounts for the last ten years he goes far to show that with care and time such farms may be even a success financially. The whole of this portion of his book will well repay a careful study.

Vol. I. of a promising new serial, "The Countries of the World" (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), by Dr. Robert Brown, author of "Races of Mankind," opens well, with some picturesque descriptions of lands and life within the Arctic Circle and in those vast regions of British North America and of the "furthest West" of the United States, where lumberer, trapper, and miner reign supreme. The illustrations are almost uniformly good, the letter-press even better; best of all the author's own account of the policy, the trading, and the wars of the grand old Hudson's Bay Company and its rivals.

Useful for the pedestrian, but still more for the bicyclist, should be the thin pocket volume, "British High Roads: North and North-Eastern Routes," Part I. (Tinsley Bros.), a true itinerary of the olden sort for the roads that lead from the metropolis to Edinburgh, well illustrated with maps—in sections the size of the page, and on the scale of three-eighths of an inch to the mile—and giving every cross road and country seat, lists of hotels and inns, and brief details of the chief objects of interest in each town to be passed. A volume very carefully got-up, and as far as we have seen quite trustworthy.

A "Tourist's Guide Round about London, within a Circle of Twelve Miles" (E. Stanford), by a F.S.A., is for the pocket what Mr. Thorne's larger work is for the study. Towns and parishes are ranged in alphabetical order, and much pains taken to make no omission of memorable houses, churches, and public buildings of architectural or historic importance, &c. Some outline half-holiday walks and sketches of excursions to Knole, St. Alban's, Hatfield, and Windsor make up a very useful appendix.

"Petites Leçons de Conversation et de Grammaire," by F. Julien (S. Low and Co.), or alternate lessons in grammar and conversation, seem very well adapted to give the pupil an interest in his work. It is no attempt at "French made easy;" but succeeds very well in giving a boy words and phrases from the very first which he must feel will be of use in real life.

We have also to acknowledge Part II. of the Rev. E. ffolson's useful "Aids to the Study of the Books of Samuel" (W. W. Gardner), and "Roman Antiquities," by Professor A. S. Wilkins, another of those excellent History Primers (Macmillan and Co.), that really seem to improve with each new issue; a charming little volume, nicely illustrated withal, in which one traces a Roman's life at school, at college, and in manhood—in public and private—at his country farm and in his town house in the Temple, before the Law Courts, at the games, to find one has acquired quite a respectable knowledge of the technicalities of classic antiquity almost without knowing how.

THE DARIEN CANAL, to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific, has been pronounced perfectly practicable by the American Expedition under Lieutenant Wyse, which has been surveying the ground. The Lieutenant suggests the construction of a canal either tunnelled, or with locks and reservoirs, running straight from the Chucunaque River just above Yavisa, along the course of the Tapisa River, across the Cordilleras to Port Gauli on the Atlantic. The cost would be about 800,000*l.* per mile, while the way is comparatively level, and has few obstacles to be removed should a tunnel be made.

FASHIONS

HITHERTO we have been accustomed to look to the French capital as the centre from whence all fashions radiated; such is no longer the case, Paris and London have entered into an amicable rivalry, and the result of their independence is very satisfactory. Whilst the Parisian modistes seek for inspiration from the costumes worn by the belles of some four centuries ago, the English designers have recourse to those of a much more recent period, and produce faithful copies after Sir Joshua Reynolds, Gainsborough, and other famous artists.

At this season the fashionable world is out of town, and the show-rooms of our leading milliners are cumbered with monstrous packing-cases, the contents of which are prepared en cachette, and displayed only to the privileged few; we will therefore describe some of these hidden treasures. First, as to the strictly useful costumes made for real earnest walking over mountains and stubble-fields, slippery rocks and wet sands. For a slender brunette of medium height a neat costume was made thus:—Skirt of stone-coloured, unshrinkable flannel, entirely kilted from the waist downwards, without any other trimming than a treble row of brown bone buttons, blouse bodice to match, fastened in at the waist with a brown leather belt, brown deep collar and cuffs, stone-coloured felt hat, the turned-up brim lined with brown, gauze veil, the end to be twisted round the throat. Another simple costume was of the Breton shape, the material was veigeuse, the groundwork of navy blue flecked with white. A third costume was of very soft beiges of the hue known as mousse des bois, a very deep green; it was trimmed with countless black bone buttons. There were several serge dresses—this material is as popular as ever it was,—they were for the most part handsomely braided, or else piped and trimmed with red or white; homespun and vicuna cloth were well represented amongst the serviceable costumes. With most of the woollen fabrics hats were made to match the dresses. We must not omit to mention that Ulsters were there, plain and checked; in spite of various attempts to improve this ugly but useful garment there is no change for the better in its shape.

Infinite variety was to be found in the promenade costumes, which were stylish and suitable for all ages and figures, although for the most part far too costly for these hard times. Here, as throughout the gamut of fashion, green of every shade, myrtle, moss, bronze, faded and bright, was the prevailing colour; every complexion, under and out of the sun, can find a becoming tint of so-called green. Two promenade costumes, the one for a blonde, the other for a brunette, were made thus: Princess robe of myrtle green velvet, quite plain, fastened on the cross, from right to left, commencing at the throat and terminating at the hem, a coarse piping of sage green silk, and groups of three mother-of-pearl buttons, arranged at close intervals, on the opening of the dress and the sleeves; with this was to be worn, on a chilly day a pointed mantelet of velvet, lined with finely quilted sage green silk, and trimmed with a deep silk fringe of the dark colour, the design tassels three rows deep. The hat, cavalier shape, was of dark green velvet, with a long sage green ostrich feather. The other costume was of a much more elaborate description, at least on paper; it consisted of a very fine dark brown cloth, demi-train skirt, open in the front over a narrow breadth of poplin some shades lighter; down the front and round the hem a wide band of faded oak-leaves and acorns in velvet, veined with dead gold. Dolman mantle, trimmed to match, and edged with a deep brown and gold waved fringe; brown velvet bonnet, with a shaded feather, from deep brown to cream white, fastened in on the left side with a branch of faded oak leaves, so faithfully imitated from nature as almost to escape detection. There was nothing new in mantles, which consisted of the old familiar Dolman, the tight-fitting and the semi-loose paletot, the natty little pilot jacket, so becoming to youthful figures, and last, but most elaborate, the "Asphodel Jacket," with its large reversible tabs buttoned alternately down the front, with festoons of knotted cord attached to rich silk medallions on either side, and trimmed with deep marabout ruches—thus does a contemporary describe this costly garment.

We need but touch upon the subject of evening attire, as those of our readers who are obliged to "cater for themselves" (for whom we offer suggestions and advice) will do well to wear out their past season dresses, provided they be neither crushed nor faded; at all events our young readers need but to provide themselves with one or two pieces of black, white, and coloured tarletane, grenadine, or net, half the quantity of reversible satin ribbon, and, with a very moderate amount of taste and industry, six charming dresses may be machined together by half that number of workers in twice that number of hours. A white or black silk well-fitting petticoat, with a low and a high bodice, should always form a part of the wardrobe of those who make their own evening dresses. Before quitting the subject of dress toilettes, we may remark en passant that beads and bugles of every hue, form, and description, may be used for trimming everything and anything.

The bonnets now in vogue are of many and divers shapes; combinations of satin, plush, and velvet, together or separate. The "Peg Woffington" is very coquettish made in black satin, with a full but narrow pleating of white satin under the brim, and a real flower or spray placed with studied carelessness amongst the voluminous bows. A black or dark hued plush Pamela bonnet suits some faces exceedingly well, whilst to others it is most unbecoming; a looking-glass is the best adviser on this point.

Amongst the minor, yet important, accessories to the toilette are collars and cuffs; they are now made in an endless variety of shapes, from the plain, fine linen "Puritan collar" fastened at the back, to the "Louis Quinze," a combination of rich lace and insertion. As the autumn creeps on we shall welcome some very pretty and delicate knitted silk shawls and scarfs, together with chenille scarfs, which are almost, if not quite as warm as fur. So strict are the decrees of fashion as to uniformity of colour and design that shoes and boots should not only be made to match the evening costume in colour, but of the same material as the dress, but the same severe law as to colour applies to the stockings, and even mittens or gloves. Until very lately coloured kid gloves, such as pink, green, or blue, were considered very bad form, and even now, although adopted by eccentric personages, they remind us vividly of the dolls of our youth before wax arms came into fashion.

Those new and most valuable helps to house-workers, artistically and accurately cut paper patterns, should now be procured for the autumn season, as shapes do not alter more than once a quarter. We may, therefore, make our preparations up to Christmastide and some weeks afterwards.

THE LANGUAGE OF HANDS

THE curious art of ascertaining individual character from handwriting has long been practised in countries where the inhabitants are familiar with the use of the pen, but the study of the hand itself as a kind of guide to the peculiar temperament of the owner remains comparatively neglected, save by that mysterious wandering race who have for generations made it the basis of those absurd and mischievous pretensions which have caused the name of gipsy to become universally regarded as synonymous with imposture and deceit. More than one eminent writer on physiological subjects has hinted that the same wonderful diversity of feature which prevents two human countenances from precisely resembling each other, save in rare and exceptional instances, is found existing also in the hand, but in a somewhat minor degree. Whether such be the case or not, it is interesting to note the manner in which the character and habits of a person are often reflected as it were in the appearance of that strange piece of mechanism, the possession of which distinguishes man from the inferior animals, even from those which are said to form the connecting link between ourselves and the brute creation. Without going so far as to agree with those who hold that the greater or less perfection of the hand corresponds with the degree of intelligence possessed by its proprietor, a theory not always in harmony with the teachings of experience,—Pope, for instance, had long and knotty hands, of most inelegant shape—it may be accepted as a matter of fact that the hand frequently affords a reliable clue to the disposition and tastes of the individual to whom it belongs. It is related by De Blainville, that on his becoming the pupil of Récamier, his hands were submitted to a close examination, it being the habit of Récamier to refuse instruction to those whose hands did not correspond with his ideas. Fortunately for the future eminent naturalist he passed the ordeal successfully. Yet his hand was neither fine nor elegant. "It was a well-made, vigorous, and muscular hand, like the body to which it belonged; equally skilful, in fact, in holding a sword, a pencil, or a scalpel."

In the workhouse and the police court the language of hands is not quite unknown. Not many months ago an inquest was held on the body of a man who had died shortly after admission into the parish infirmary. Nobody knew whom he was, or from whence he came, but the relieving officer expressed a conviction that the deceased had been a common labouring man, by reason of his hands being the same as those characteristic of that class. There was more of natural philosophy in this than the speaker imagined, for we have been told that if men of inferior position often have thick and inflexible hands, it is because they are often born under conditions which impose rough work upon them. They receive as a heritage, with the toil of their fathers, this clumsiness of form, which is the consequence of this toil; but although severe labour will do much to alter the appearance of the hand, it can never wholly destroy its original character. The soft, flabby hand of the professional tramp never deceives the keen gaze of the superintendent of a casual ward, neither will the hard, puckered lines, the horny protuberances here and there, prevent his recognising the fine and well-shaped hand of one who was not originally intended to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. In the police court the hands of a suspected professional thief are always systematically inspected, and very frequently does their silent but unerring testimony belie the oft-repeated assertion of the accused that he is "a poor hard-working man." A skilful pickpocket must have light and delicate fingers, the perfection of which would become destroyed by the least manual labour; but while these enable him successfully to pursue his nefarious calling until arrested, they become unimpeachable witnesses against him the moment that he falls into the clutches of justice.

Perhaps the money-takers at places of amusement, and ticket-clerks at railway stations see more of the human hand than do any other class of the community. An experienced money-taker at one of the West End theatres states that the difference in the appearance of the hands beheld by him in his little box on the gallery stairs, and those he afterwards became familiar with when promoted to the principal entrance, was very great. He learned to distinguish the large massive paw of the carpenter or blacksmith from the small and almost womanish hand of the decorative painter, or the long nervous hand of the bookkeeper. The thick, freckled, and hairy hand of the seafaring man bore not the least resemblance to the red, plump fist of the working farmer, or the thin hand of the factory operative. The hands of the softer sex afforded the same variety, that of the laundress differing from those of the shop assistant or the housemaid, and so on to the end of the chapter. The manner in which the money is given by the hand in exchange for tickets also often reveals the true character of its owner, especially at one of the stations of the Underground Railway. The quick hasty gesture with which the hurried man of business flings down a coin forms a suggestive contrast to the slowness with which the money is handed over by a professional money-lender. The jaunty "man about town" generally pushes forward his shilling or half-crown as it were scarcely worth the trouble of waiting for the change; while the timid milliner's apprentice tremblingly offers the carefully-counted money as if she were apprehensive of losing it. The changing character of the hands presented to the gaze of the ticket-clerk during a single day is very interesting and suggestive. First come, early in the morning, those of the travellers by workmen's trains, amongst whom are generally a few belated revellers returning home after a night of dissipation; then we have shop assistants and warehouse hands, followed by office clerks, managers, and so forth. Later on the principals of City establishments begin to put in an appearance, while later in the day the feminine element begins to preponderate. But railway ticket-clerks are seldom philosophers. Were it otherwise the world would have a chance of becoming more enlightened respecting the language of hands. JOHN PLUMMER

MANDERSCHEID

CANON KINGSLEY (or, at any rate, his biographer) is rather sparing of his European travel notes. He tells us of his simple-minded astonishment at the beauty of Paris, and at the fact which in Paris seemed to dawn on him that "these French can build;" but, compared with his grand pictures of American and West Indian scenery, his German journal is disappointing. Yet the man who could so elaborately describe his "winter garden" among the Bramshill fir-trees did not need "something very big" to move his sympathy. Perhaps, like most of us, he went ahead too fast, and hadn't time to write much about what he saw. However, he enjoyed the Eifel—how could he fail to do so? And he just hits off in a few words the peculiar features of what he does describe. For instance, he says, "Came upon Manderscheid, a place like nothing else in the whole world." And that is all so true; you do come upon Manderscheid, for there is very little said about in the guide-books. You have probably come by rail from Treves, up the wild gorge of the Kyll—you don't see such scenery at home, even on the railways in Derbyshire. You intend to go up the crater of the Mosenberg, and after that to see the maars (craters turned into little tarns) near Daun. Leaving Treves by the five o'clock train you catch at Kyllburg the 'bus to Oberkail. There is a lone inn, however, on the upland, where the driver will drop you if you ask for the nearest point to the Mosenberg, and where you can sleep pleasantly amid the scent of firwoods.

A walk through the woods next morning, with a plunge down into the boggy grass-land (such shabby grass) of Maarfeld, brings you to the crater, or rather craters—for there are three. They are trying to plant trees in terraces on the slopes; but the slaty soil seems poor, just the reverse of what we suppose volcanic soil to be. The view is very fine; huge forests, broken by the sweet little valley of the Kyll, and here and there bare downs tilled in broad ribbons.

On the edge of one of these downs, half seen from the Mosenberg, is Manderscheid, a long straggling town, with a look of comfort about it. How much alike these big town-villages are in Germany and England, ay, and in France, too; it is when you get into the cities that the national characteristics mostly come out. Here there are no costumes, no book-shops with foreign prints, no cafés, no soldiers, not even a policeman. You think of Philip's Norton, and half-a-dozen other Somerset or Gloucestershire townlets; though the stone here is darker, the thatch a trifle greener, and the arrangements for winter fuel (wood, of course, and therefore bulky) more prominent than in England. Even the dinner at the clean little hotel, midway down the street, is English enough, though never except en famille do even Germans produce a pudding.

The inn at the entrance of the town, where you get a glass of beer, is just like an English roadside inn—the beer, by the way, is far better; it is Felsenbier from Niedermendig, where it has been kept cool in the old quarries out of which the Romans dug mill-stones, and in which the snow that fell in winter is not melted in July. German beer ought to be good, for it claims a king as its first maker. A coloured print on the wall, the only un-English thing in the place (except the excellent creaming beer), tells us:

Gambrinus bin ich genannt,
König von Flandern und Brabant.
Aus Gersten hab' ich Malz gemacht,
Das Bierbrauen zuerst erdacht.
Denn konnen die Brauer mit Stolz erkunden
Dasz ein König es war der das Bier erfunden.

But Manderscheid, which seems so English till you go into the churchyard, with its crosses and wreaths, and little glazed niches of mementos, has one thing which no English village can show the like of. You go down a steep side street, past two or three houses which seem just made for a retired attorney or the widow of a local doctor; there is a sharp turn, and suddenly two castles come in sight, standing as castles never stood before except on the drop-scene of a theatre, one high up on a spur of rock, the other on a similar spur, but rather nearer the level of the little river that winds below. You think the two are dangerously close together; but cross the old Gothic bridge down below, and mount up into the first castle, and you will see that between you and the other there is a double precipice. With long-range guns one could knock the other to pieces; but in the old days they must have been well sundered by that deep winding gorge. Such contortions of the clay slate, as the cliffs go sheer down to the narrow meadows which border the stream; the strata, once horizontal, are twisted into a series of S's of all thicknesses. To the upper castle there is a track along the "hogs' back" ridge, stretching down from the town, and forming an elbow in one of the windings of the river. Thus it must have been almost insulated, for a couple of men could have held that narrow way against an army.

Why two castles? It is the old story, which you find repeated at Elz, near the Moselle, where Archbishop Baldwin of Treves, built Trutz-Elz to overawe his unruly vassal of that ilk. Count Matfried, says the Chronicle of Prüm, was a famous man against the Normans, and married a wife of Namur. His successor, William, built Manderscheid Castle, which is mentioned in Emperor Otho's cartulary in 974. His great-great-grandsons, Walter and Richard, were, as most Germans now are, fond of unpleasant practical jokes. One day Richard slipped a cat into Walter's steel boot (Beinharnisch) just as he was going out on a foray. He got fearfully scratched, and so ruffled in temper that, as soon as he could wear a boot, he rode off to Archbishop Albers and made the castle over to him as a fief. Richard of course would not agree to this; but the Archbishop took his castle by storm; and then Richard seized the elbow of land aforesaid and fortified himself there. This accounts for the rival castle.

The view down upon the two is one which the traveller through the Eifel should by no means miss. The wonder is that no Treves photographer has yet taken it. The only photograph to be had is one from a painting; it naturally gives more than a photograph could, but gives it less correctly. Perhaps it is owing to the two castles and the rivalry between Count and Bishop that Manderscheid has such a look of solid comfort. It is not, as many mediæval towns are, quite overmastered—dominé—by feudalism. In the Lower Eifel, near Laach, stands Olbruck, one of the seats of the grand old Von der Leyen family. Here castle is everything and village nothing. The former is vast—covers the whole of a flat-topped cone of basalt; the latter is mean, damp, wretched, grovelling down at the hill foot amongst undrained marshes. But Manderscheid holds its own (as Loches in Touraine does, despite its grand castle, big enough to be a second town). The Manderscheid Church is naught; the great folks are all buried at Himmerod (to which monastery some of them used to retire when tired of that battle of life, which for them literally was a battle) or at Oberkail, a place where 22,000 French prisoners were internés during the war. But, besides the castles, Manderscheid itself is a place well worth loafing in for an hour; the people have the blunt friendliness of Germans unused to strangers. Besides, it is on the way to the maars; and if you shirk the walk to those not-to-be-omitted wonders, the post leaves for Daun every day about eleven. H. S. F.

AMONGST THE LEAD MINERS

FAR away in the bleak recesses of the north-western dales of Yorkshire, and of those to the west of the adjoining county of Durham, a large portion of the lead produced in England is brought to bank. In many of these dales lead-mining may be considered not only the oldest, but the chief, industry. In some popular rumour dates back the period of first-known working to the Roman era, and there have been found evidences that this is at least partially true. And it is somewhat singular that generation after generation has preserved the industry in families and kept the old names amongst the miners. And thus in Teesdale the Viponds may be met with in numbers; in Swaledale the Blenkirons and Waggetts; and in Weardale the Emersons and Dawsons have been miners for generations. In most cases, too, these lead mining districts are isolated in situation, shut in, north and south, by high hills, and only rarely traversed by railways, so that there is preserved in them a quaintness of custom and even of dialect such as are being banished elsewhere. The mode of payment is arranged on a peculiar basis; the period of work varies greatly from that of settled industries, and the conditions under which it is accomplished are such as to have given rise to customs whose quaintness takes us far back. It is true that at the present time these customs and conditions are giving way, and that the introduction of newer industries is beginning to have its effect on the old, but the old die out only slowly, and the lead mining dales present life to the observer in fresh, and piquant, and quaint, and curious characters. Leased from the owners of the soil, the right to mine in each of two most northern dales is chiefly in the hands of two great firms, who have for centuries been the great employers of labour therein, and who have acquired vast revenues therefrom. And for generations the mode of working and the mode of payment have varied in detail, but have been identical in principle. The work of lead-getting is done by companies of six or eight miners who contract to do it at a stipulated price per "bing" of lead ore, or per fathom excavated. But to this payment by "piece-work" the lead miners have acquired by custom advantages of the regular wage system, for they have what is called subsistence money, or "subsist" paid monthly to them. This custom is due to the long reckonings known in the dales, generally three months, and up to a recent period, in one dale yearly. Lead mining is precarious work, and it not unfrequently happens that the average earnings of the members of a company of miners does not equal the amount each has received as subsistence money, and when the "run of luck" is against a man it may happen that he will be for years indebted to the mine owners—in some instances living and dying in debt, in others, in one fortunate year clearing off the debts of many previous. The period of work is also peculiar. As lead mining is deemed to be an industry injurious to health, the "week's" work is one of forty hours, divided into four or five days; and as the mine is often a considerable distance from the villages where the lead miners reside, "mine-shops," or rude barracks, are constructed for them near the mine, and in these, more especially in winter, the men pass such of the time of the four or five days as is not occupied in actual work. Roughly divided into two compartments, the first of these is hung around with the muddy and earth-stiffened mine garments of the men, whilst the second is brightened by a huge fire of peat, wood, or coal, and, in one or two instances of late, gas, abstracted from peat, adds to the brilliancy of the light. A few benches, a rough table, a cupboard for food, rough cooking utensils, and now and again a few well-thumbed books from the mine owners' libraries, complete the equipments of the lower rooms, whilst the upper chamber contains a dozen or so of rude beds. Associating in these, the miners place themselves under the rule of a "king," who takes the government of the domestic affairs of his little kingdom—the mine-shop, but whose edicts are law for his subjects even beyond its unpalatial precincts. If, for instance, a shop-keeper offends against the unwritten laws of the miners, his doom until repentance is decreed; and if a miner similarly offends, and by debt brings disrepute on the companionship, a council, with its "kingly" president, sends him to Coventry, in a mode as complete as town unionists do "blacklegs." When the short, but exhaustive "week" of the miner is completed, he returns to his home; attends, it may be, to his little grazing farm of a few acres, which many miners possess, cultivates the gardens which are held as alternatives for the same reason—to furnish healthy out-door exercise, or in some other way adds to his scanty mine-earnings, and counteracts in a degree the influence of work in the long galleries that penetrate the hill sides in quest of the leaden veins. It is needless to describe the mode of working, for it is one which has undergone little change for centuries. It is sufficient to say that the mode is usually by levels, driven into the side of the hill, but sometimes a "rise" by ladders, or a "sump" or shaft, may vary the level, to the extent even of fifty feet. In the level the pitmen work, the results of their labour being brought in mine tubs on a tramway to the mouth of the mine, where it is washed—the metallic particles remaining after the washing, whilst the earthen with a portion of lead is carried to a circular "buddle," where a part of the lead is abstracted, and the rest, which is irreclaimable but small, passes down as "hush" into the streams. The average results of the miners' work—their earnings in one of the best paid of the dales—may be taken as not more than 1*l.* per "week."

There are strongly marked personal characteristics in the lead-mining dales, one of which is the degree to which dissent is accepted as the popular faith. Although Weardale was originally "bishop's land," yet the followers of Wesley many times outnumber the Episcopalians; and in the adjoining Vale of the Tees, Primitive Methodism and Methodism together number the great bulk of the people, so that you may travel for miles in the upper part of the dale without seeing a church, though chapels abound in various stages of structural squatness and solidity. In language, olden peculiarities linger. To churn is still to "kern," meddle is still represented by "mell," ale takes the not infrequent sound of "all," and fair earnings are spoken of as "good addlings." The vowels are broadened, the r is buzzed out, and the i becomes "ah," so that "fahve mahles" is the representative for five miles, the day is "keull," and in answer to an inquiry whether it always rains in Teesdale, you may be reminded that it "snahs sometahms." In another lead-mining dale, the clannishness and inter-marriage of the people has kept the same surnames for generations so common that to distinguish between those whose names do not differ recourse is had to the father's name, and even then the undistinguished have recourse to the grandparents, so that an Edward Blenkiron might be marked out from the number by the prefix of the names of two generations, and be dubbed "Edward's John's Ned." That great leveller of distinctions, the railway, is beginning, however, to efface peculiarities of speech and of sport, and is doing away with the quaint customs that have so long marked the dales people. It is lessening, also, the superabundant labour of the dales, and thus is making the remainder more valuable. The villages once isolated are brought within the beaten track of tourists; the patriarchal relations between capital and labour are giving place to commercial ones, and the slow advance of agricultural science in the dales is beginning to transform the long-known landmarks of long meadows, alternated with moors empurpled in the autumn, and long low hills that shut in the dales. Thus the quiet and quaint mode of life will soon become a thing of the past, but it will be well for the lead-mining dales if the development of scientific modes of working the mines, the levelling down of old customs, the adoption of a commercial basis for all relations, and the introduction of newer industries,—it will be well if these leave the old independence, frugality, and life-long honesty, as well as the lore of the native dale, they find there.

New Music

W. Czerny.——One of the most useful and admirable serial publications of this period is "Moments de Loisir, Morceaux Classiques et Populaires pour violon et piano," by W. Czerny; alike in the study and the home circle they will be found of great utility. No. 13 is a refined and pleasing arrangement of Beethoven's immortal "Adelaide;" No. 14 is a charming duo for the violon or violoncello, and pianoforte, by Carl Hause; No. 15, a well-known and popular "Air à la Bourrée," by Handel; No. 16, a modern but equally popular madrigal by J. B. Wekerlin; No. 17, "Rondo Giocoso," by Haydn; 18, a "Menuet," by C. Wekerlin; 19, "Gavotte in D," by J. S. Bach, arranged in a musicianly manner, therefore sure to be a favourite of the series; No. 20, a quaint morceau by Pringuer, entitled "Queen Bess's Solemne Daunce."—Moderately advanced students will find recreation in "Six Characteristic Pieces" for the pianoforte (second series), by Oscar Beringer. No. 1, a lively "Pas Redouble;" No. 2 is a very meek and feeble "Little Waltz;" No. 3, a "Simple Melody," is a pretty morceau, very superior to its predecessor, of the "song without words" school; No. 4, a melodious "Gavotte," which will catch the juvenile ear, as will also "Humoresque" (No. 5); No. 6, "Pastorale," is also a pleasing little morceau.—The first three numbers of "New Favourite National Songs," composed and arranged by Ferdinand Waser, translated into English by Finlay Finlayson, are: No. 1, "May I Love My Love," a piquante song for a soprano, quite out of the beaten track; Nos. 2 and 3, for a sentimentally disposed baritone, entitled respectively "Fair White Lily" and "O, Fairest Day."

Messrs. Simpson and Co.——To judge by the example before us poetry matures by keeping. "The Sea King," a poem written by Motherwell more than eighty years ago, is full of life and vigour; Louis Diehl has set it to a spirited melody, albeit we have heard the like before.—"The Knight's Leap," a romantic legend, forms the subject of a poem by Charles Kingsley. J. Hardman has written appropriate music for it. Both words and music are very good of their kind.—A favourite old hymn by the late Dr. Faber, "Faith of our Fathers," comes to us in a simple form for four voices, and also got up with an elaborate frontispiece of purple and gold, the music edited by J. E. Vernham; the former is preferable to the latter.—Total abstainers cannot fail to be pleased with "Three Temperance Songs," written and composed by C. Bicknell and H. E. Hodson: No. 1, "Bring Us the Cup;" No. 2, "Temptation;" No. 3, "Come, Fill Up Your Glasses." All three of these songs are in praise of water as an exhilarating beverage, and deserve attention if only on account of their theme.—A vocal waltz of the Arditi type, "I'll Dream of Thee To-Night" (Io Sognero d'Amor) is composed by W. F. Taylor, words by J. S. Lyons, Parole di Reginaldo Barnett; the joint stock poetry is not what one would expect from a pair of poets, and the music is of a very ordinary description.—Baron Carlo Mora has transcribed for the pianoforte Wrighton's two popular ballads, "Bright as a Seraph" and "The Waggoner," the former transcription is far superior to the latter.—"Les Etrilles" is the eccentric title for a pretty, but somewhat weak, Valse pour le pianoforte par Le Comte Guillaume Van de Burch.—The "Ride a Cock Horse Quadrilles," arranged by R. Andrews on nursery melodies, will surely please the young folks, and tempt them to dance with plenty of energy.

Messrs. Enoch and Sons.——The tender love poem attributed to Shakespeare, "Be my Love," has inspired George Fox to the composition of a charming melody which he has dedicated "To Laura;" the compass is limited from E on the first line to the octave above.—As is generally the case with our budgets from this firm, the instrumental music not only preponderates over the vocal, but is also of a superior character.—Vol. 451, "Format Litolff," contains three gems by Schumann for the pianoforte, namely, No. I., "Arabeske" (Op. 18); No. II., "Blumenstücke" (Op. 19); and No. III., "Humoreske."—Those of our readers who are apt to associate the name of Rubinstein with almost insuperable difficulties will be both surprised and gratified to meet with a graceful melody in F major by this composer within the powers of an ordinary executant.—We have met with numerous arrangements of the beautiful melody known as "The Vesper Hymn," but no transcriber has done it more justice than J. Pridham, who has transcribed it in a most pleasing style, under the title of "Vesper Chimes," a fantasie for the pianoforte.—A bright and cheerful "Mélodie" for the pianoforte, by Cotsford Dick, may be easily learnt by heart, and played, with satisfaction to executant and audience, after dinner.—A merry galop is "Tout-de-Suite," by Georges Lamothe, and by the same composer is the "Tête-à-Tête Valse,"—the music is dance-inspiring, the frontispiece is a most gorgeous representation of two birds of a rare species with rose pink breasts and brown backs, perched on a nest surrounded by gay flowers.

Messrs. Wood and Co.——A pleasing after-dinner piece is "Chanson," pour piano, by J. Alfred Owen, quite a "song without words.—No. XI. of "Sunbeams," "La Donna è Mobile," is one of the series; its adaptor, Frank Percival, found this tuneful song more easy to simplify than some of its companions. It is also arranged as a duet.—One of the most popular waltzes of the season is "Gestohlen Kusse" ("Stolen Kisses"), by Hans Waldenfeldt; its popularity promises to be almost as great as that of the "Blue Danube Waltz."—"Osman Pasha," a Turkish war march, is an inspiriting melody; the time well marked, very creditable to its composer, Adolph Meyer, and worthy of the attention of military and civil bands.

Messrs. Goddard and Co.——Both words and music of a ballad by J. H. L. Glover, entitled "Snowdrops," are refined and pathetic, compass from B below the lines to E on the fourth space.—By the above composer is a carefully written pianoforte piece, "May Morning" (companion to "Night Music").—It is but seldom that Lindsay Sloper strays into the beaten path of transcribers. He has been tempted thither by Charles Gounod's admired and never tiresome serenade, "La Berceuse," which he has transcribed for the pianoforte most tastefully avec deux variantes, as the title-page tells us.—"Noch Einmal Waltz," by Bliss Wainwright, is of a very ordinary type; but the time is well marked.

Messrs. Wood and Co.——A homely narrative song of medium compass, well fitted for the family circle, is "'Twas Evening, in the Summer Time," written and composed by J. W. King and F. A. Mori.—From Immanuel Liebich come a brace of pleasing trifles for the pianoforte, easily learnt by heart, and as speedily forgotten, entitled "Mignonette" and "Deux Yeux."—Fabio Campana has adopted the reprehensible system of publishing a "Nocturne Helene" in the key of D flat, for what he styles "concert players," and in D natural for ordinary executants. We trust that his example may not be followed by other composers, or else we may have the three degrees of comparison musically illustrated.

Miscellanies.——Those musical teachers who are called upon to instruct adult beginners cannot do better than take up "A New Method for the Piano," translated from the German of Aloys Hennes (25th Edition), by Professor H. Mannheimer. This very clever work is divided into five courses, being a guide for young beginners, from the very commencement to the "Etudes" of Bertini and Cramer, and the "Sonatas" of Haydn, Mozart, and Clementi (Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.).—In spite of their title, there is nothing pedantic or scholastic in "Three Part School Songs" (Second Set), by J. Borschitzsky. This series consists of fifteen tuneful compositions, the words by various poets, including J. Mackay, J. Bowring, Mrs. Hemans, and others. As excellent specimens of the series may be mentioned No. 2, "The Weaver's Song," a nervous poem by Barry Cornwall; No. 3, Charles Mackay's spirited poem, "Cleon and I," and by the same writer, No. 6, "Little at First, but Mighty at Last." As home-circle companions for the coming long winter's evenings we can recommend the four neatly and cheaply got up numbers (in parts) of this series (J. F. Borschitzsky).—A brace of songs for medium voices, written and composed by F. G. Weatherly, M.A., and W. C. Levey, are "The Little Flower Girl" and "The Mill Maid." The former is tragical, the latter is cheerful.—A dashing song, with a somewhat too alliterative title, is "Ralph the Ranger: The Royalist's Ride," words by F. C. Weatherly, M.A., the music by J. P. Knight, published in two keys, for baritone or bass.—No. 3 of "Morley's Magazine of Musical Treasures" contains ten celebrated Marches by great composers, arranged in an easy manner for the pianoforte (W. Morley, jun.).—A ballad, "tender and true," is "Years Ago," the pathetic words by O. W. Holmes, the music by F. Hoffmann (Messrs. Thurgate and Sons).—The delicately designed frontispiece will draw attention to "Lieb Gretchen" (Daisy Dear), Walzer, composed by Henry Klein. The music will disappoint the expectations raised thereby (Messrs. C. Boosey and Co.).—It is questionable whether or no the result produced is worth the trouble expended thereon in "A Romance of Love" (Minnespiel), vocal waltzes for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, and two performers on the pianoforte; the music by H. Hofmann, English version by Lewis Novra. This elaborate composition extends over forty pages. Were it half the length it would be so much the less tedious. The same amount of labour expended by executants and composer upon a more congenial work would produce a more satisfactory result than the performance of these vocal waltzes, clever as they are (Messrs. Witt and Co.).

Washington's Silver Watch is now in the possession of a gentleman in Kansas, United States. It is over 150 years old, and, although the face is perfect, the hands are gone, and the works are very much out of repair. The initials "G. W." are engraved on the case, and a chain is attached. Washington used this watch until he became President, when he gave it to his private secretary, General Atkins, from whom it has descended to its present owner.

M. Jules Verne's fiction of "Round the World in Ninety Days" is to be carried out on a large scale by the "Woodruff Scientific Expedition Round the World," an American expedition organised for the instruction of students in scientific pursuits. The Woodruff Expedition will consist of about 400 students, under the charge of a large staff of professors, in a steamer, the Ontario, fitted with a large library and all educational appliances, while lectures will be given during the voyage, inland expeditions organised, and collections of all kinds will be formed by the students. Starting from New York on the 1st, the Ontario will sail for the West Indies, skirt South America, pass through the Straits of Magellan to the Pacific, explore the chief islands, and visit Australia. From thence the expedition will go on to Japan, China, and the Philippine Islands, through the Straits of Malacca to Calcutta, sail round India to Bombay, the Persian Gulf, and by the Red Sea to the Suez Canal. The vessel will next visit Greece and Italy, will skirt the south of France and Spain to Lisbon, call at Cherbourg, and conclude her trip at Plymouth, whence she will sail for home in October, 1879. Time will be given for students to make inland excursions. They are expected to wear a special uniform, and the fee for the trip is 500*l.*—no extravagant charge for a two years' voyage of 50,000 miles.

THE FAMINE IN INDIA—SCENES IN THE BELLARY DISTRICT, MADRAS PRESIDENCY

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——Rain and snow on the Danube and in Roumelia have caused a temporary suspension of operations. The wet weather has seriously embarrassed the Russians with regard to their supplies, as the roads are seas of mud, and the cattle die on the way, while it has also delayed the troops, who travel with a large amount of impedimenta. The Imperial Guard, amounting to 50,000 men, was expected before Plevna this week, and as a proof that the Russians intend to abandon their reckless plan of assault, and to reduce Osman Pasha by a steady and determined siege, General Todleben, the defender of Sebastopol, has been appointed Chief of Prince Charles's general staff, vice General Zotoff. A clear-headed man is certainly much needed before Plevna, as reports declare the army to be without head or plan, and thoroughly at sea. General Todleben is likely to invest Plevna completely, and will hardly allow the safe arrival of a relief expedition like that of Chefket Pasha last week, with 10,000 men and plentiful ammunition and provisions. Scant opposition was offered to this convoy, as the Russian attacking force had no infantry at hand. The Roumanians, however, were more successful, and last week captured eighty waggons of Turkish provisions. Indeed Prince Charles's troops are well up to their work, and are doing good service in the trenches. They have sapped up to within fifty yards of the redoubt north-west of the Gravitza redoubt, and this redoubt once taken, an attack could be made against the entrenched camp on the western brow of the Gravitza ridge, the very key of Plevna, as it commands the town and the other redoubts. In their turn the Turks have constructed forts along the Sofia road, to serve as bases of supplies, and to secure a line of retreat. It is alleged that the Russians will make a supreme effort to capture Plevna, and if successful will march on Sofia and Adrianople. At the same time General Gourko will recross the Balkans, and take Raouf Pasha in the rear, and the Czarevitch will resume the siege of Rustchuk.

Finding the Russians too strongly entrenched for a front attack, and his supplies too far distant, Mehemet Ali retired across the Banicka Lom, to his former positions on the Kara Lom. This step has evidently given offence at the Porte. He has been superseded by Suleiman Pasha, while Raouf Pasha, late commander of Shumla, has succeeded the latter in the Balkans. The Russian outposts have been pushed forward to Popkoi, where there have been some small skirmishes, while the Czarevitch's lines now extend from Metchka on the Danube, past Biela, to Tirnova, and are declared impregnable. Fever and dysentery are prevalent amongst his men, however, and forage is scarce. Rustchuk was freshly bombarded on Friday, the station being shelled for the first time, and on the same day Rahova was unsuccessfully attacked by the Roumanians. The only other items of fighting are a Russian repulse at Medjidié, in the line of Trajan's Wall, a reconnaissance against Tatar Bazanljik—the first news of Zimmerman's Dobrudscha force we have had for weeks—and a skirmish near Pyrgos. Snow has fallen heavily in the Shipka, where the Russians have brought up mortars, and fired one of the enemy's powder magazines. There was an engagement at Elena on Monday week, when both sides claim the victory, and a sharp battle in the Kamvanserai Pass on Thursday week, resulting in a Russian success. In ASIA General Tergukassoff and Ismail Pasha fought two serious engagements on the 21st and 27th ult., of which the result is doubtful, while there has been a skirmish near Anlahan. Mukhtar Pasha also claims a success, at Necjoran, on Thursday week, but on Wednesday last he met with a repulse near Kamjal.

The continuance of the war is now looked upon as certain, and it is probable that the Czar, who, by the way, has had a slight attack of fever, will not quit the field. The rumours of mediation by the Powers are strenuously denied, as also the wish of the Russian people for peace, though it is said that the Czar desires the end of the campaign, and the Czarevitch supports war à outrance. Russia is strongly urging Servia to action, and Prince Milan has been holding Ministerial Councils daily, while it is still declared that the Servians will cross the frontier on the 15th prox., when their succour would be of great value round Plevna. The troops are ready, supplies and money are plentiful, and it is reported that only Austrian intervention keeps Prince Milan back. AUSTRIA, however, is well occupied with repressing the Turkish sympathies of her own subjects, and a plot has been discovered, by which 5,000 Hungarians were to have crossed the frontier of Transylvania into Roumania to destroy the railroad and fall upon the Russian rear. Large quantities of arms and ammunition have been seized at the various railway stations, and numerous arrests made, while General Klapka has been named as the chief of the attempt. The General, however, declares his innocence, stating that although the moral support of the Hungarians must be given to Turkey, any attempts to organise guerilla warfare would be useless. Meanwhile Austria officially proclaims her neutrality, and Herr Tisza in the Hungarian Diet last week, replying to the interpellations on Eastern affairs, declared that the Government policy consisted in the protection of the interests of the country, denied any leaning towards Russia, and remarked that the Imperial Triple Alliance had never existed, while he begged to be excused any statement of what Austria would do in the event of Servian action. Similar assertions were made by Prince Auersperg in the Austrian Reichsrath. Agitation is afloat in ROUMANIA anent a recall of the army, and the Government is severely blamed for its action, while the Legislature are reported to propose meeting on their own authority. Rumour declares that the Russians have asked for a further contingent of 40,000 men, promising part of Russian Bessarabia as a reward. Roumanian Bessarabia, says the same report, has appealed to the Czar against Roumanian misrule.—MONTENEGRO is satisfied with its successes—the fortress of Goransko having now capitulated, and the Prince will probably remain solely on the defensive. CONSTANTINOPLE is occupied with the wounded, and the Porte has agreed to allow the Russians to bring timber across the Danube for the construction of hospitals. The suffering among the Russian wounded is even greater than that among the Turkish, and a number of German military surgeons have been sent to their assistance. Bent on encouraging his generals the Sultan has bestowed on Osman and Mouktar Pashas the title of "Ghazi"—"victorious." In BOSNIA the Government has appealed to the insurgents to return home, and to trust in the Padishah's clemency and pardon—rather a broken reed.

FRANCE.——The electoral fever runs high, and manifestoes of all shades, episcopal pastorals, and Government prosecutions and prohibitions rain down upon the electors. Clericalism has strongly declared itself in favour of the Marshal. Authorised by the Pope himself, the Archbishop of Bourges has fixed three days of prayer throughout his diocese for the return of a Conservative Chamber, and other prelates are not slow to follow the example. The Archbishop of Chambéry even asserts that abstention from the poll would prove the voter a bad Christian, as Church and country tearfully entreat they may not be left to the mercy of the wicked. On their part the Government watch minutely every speech and pamphlet, even pouncing upon treasonable pocket-handkerchiefs, and prohibiting the exhibition of political writings in booksellers' shops where they might be read by passers-by, dissolve clubs and any too outspoken meetings, and intend to prosecute several Republicans for their electoral circulars. However, the Republicans persistently refuse to be irritated, and continue to evince that unity and moderation which has so annoyed and thwarted their adversaries. They now contest 526 seats out of 533, while 48 of their seats are uncontested by the Conservatives. M. Grévy has been formally recognised as the Republican leader by the Committee of the 9th Arrondissement—M. Thiers' old seat—who style him the proper guide of the 363, and the eventual successor of Marshal MacMahon. "When the nation shall have spoken," say they, "if the Executive does not bow, the contest will be between France and one man"—a cry echoed in more guarded phrase by most Republican manifestoes and speeches. The name of the latter is simply legion, and we need only mention a forcible oration by M. Louis Blanc to his Paris constituents, condemning the late Chamber, but warning all his friends to avoid extremes, and to support existing institutions. Radicalism is very quiet in Paris, and has held but one meeting, under M. Clemenceau, when red rosettes, the term "citoyens," and plenty of noise were the chief characteristics. M. Gambetta has fallen into disgrace with the more violent of his Belleville electors, who have put up M. Bonnet-Duverdier—ex-President of the Municipal Council, and now in prison for uncourtier-like language—in opposition. M. Duverdier, however, has declined the honour, and M. Gambetta has taken no notice, but has been repeating his former defence of the Opposition at Noisiel (Seine et Marne). He has formally appealed against his sentence, and the trial comes on once more next week, when he will probably address the Court.

The Conservatives are fully as active, but the Monarchists are somewhat disgusted at the immense number of Bonapartists put forward as official candidates. Indeed, the Imperialists under Government support number 298 against 131 Legitimists and 83 Orleanists, and in 31 seats the two parties have a double nomination and clash seriously. Placards printed on white paper—the official colour—and naming the candidates as "Candidates of Marshal MacMahon's Government," have been sent to the mayors for posting on the various public buildings, and several officials have been dismissed in consequence of their refusal to post the obnoxious proclamation. Amongst the Bonapartists M. Rouher comes forward with an address supporting the Marshal while praising the Empire, and the whole Imperialist party join in an outcry against Prince Napoleon, who has appealed to his Corsican electors as a Democrat. The Duc Decazes—with rat-like instinct—is careful not to identify himself either with any definite policy, or with the Cabinet, and professes himself the "friend of Marshal MacMahon." After Monday next the Government will have matters all its own way, as neither meetings nor addresses are allowed for five days before the elections, and whilst the Opposition is legally condemned to quiet, the Cabinet has ample means at its disposal for occult influence. Both parties seem confident of success.

ITALY.——One of the most prominent candidates for the Papacy, Cardinal Riario Sforza, has died at the age of sixty-seven. He was thought to have the best chance of the Papal throne, and his death is much regretted by moderate Catholics, as he had recently shown a spirit of conciliation towards the Italian Government. The Pope is much better, and has been giving audiences.—Much importance is attached to Signor Crispi's recent visit to Berlin, when Prince Bismarck is reported to have declared that at the present Pope's death the struggle between Church and State must be brought to an end by some means; while rumour asserts that Italian aid was promised in the event of another war between Germany and France. Before leaving Berlin Signor Crispi sent a farewell telegram to Emperor William thanking him for his reception.—The remains of General Nino Bixio were landed at Genoa on Saturday, and the funeral took place next day.

UNITED STATES.——The next Session of Congress will probably be marked by a strong opposition to the President. Notwithstanding his hitherto successful policy and his late gratifying Southern tour, many members of the New York Republican State Convention are seriously annoyed with President Hayes's Civil Service Reform, and at a late meeting, at the instigation of Senator Conkling, openly declared their antagonism. Their proceedings are, however, generally blamed, and the Union League Club of New York intends to call a mass meeting in favour of the Government. President Hayes, however, has now lost the support of Mr. Conkling and Mr. Cameron, who were valuable aids to General Grant.—There has been a serious Indian raid on the Mexican border, and an American detachment pursued the Indians into Mexican territory with no success, as the marauders had been warned. The Nez Percé Chief Joseph also has managed to cross the Missouri on his way to join Sitting Bull in Canada.—Army reform is to be discussed when Congress opens. The Secretary of War will recommend the increase of the army to 40,000 men, and the adoption of British battalion organisation.

INDIA.——The Madras Famine reports continue satisfactory, as there has been a good rainfall, and the summer crops are nearly in. Prices, however, have not yet fallen much, although the number on the Relief Works diminished 64,839 in the week ending Sept. 22. During July there were 113,494 deaths in the Presidency against an ordinary average of 33,442. Rain has also fallen in Mysore, and the number of persons receiving relief has accordingly decreased. From Bombay reports are favourable; but in the Central Provinces, the North-West, and the Punjaub rain is much wanted. The Government has found it impossible to do without official assistance, and public servants have been formed into committees to distribute the funds; 60,000*l.* have been allotted, including 10,000*l.* for Mysore and a similar sum for Bombay.—There has been a fresh raid of the Jowakis Afridis, and an expedition will probably be sent against the tribe next month.

THE COURT

THE Queen is enjoying lovely weather in the Highlands, and the season at Balmoral is so mild that wild roses, sweet peas, elder flowers, and lime blossoms are in full bloom, while the heather is coming out afresh. Last week the Princess of Wales and her children came over to lunch at Balmoral, when Mr. H. Lambeth's choir from Glasgow sang before Her Majesty and the Royal family. On Saturday the Duke of Connaught left Balmoral, and Prince Leopold returned to the castle from St. Andrews, while in the afternoon the Queen and Princess Beatrice visited the Prince and Princess at Abergeldie. Mr. Cross joined the Royal party at dinner. On Sunday Divine Service was performed at Balmoral before Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice, the Rev. A. Campbell of Crathie officiating. Next day, the Queen with the Princess of Wales and the Princess Beatrice drove through Braemar and Mar Forest to the Geldie Shiel, and Prince Leopold visited the Falls of Quoich, while in the evening Miss Lindsay, Viscount Macduff, and Mr. Cross dined with Her Majesty.—The Queen has given 250*l.* to the funds of the Red Cross Society towards the relief of the wounded in the East.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and their children remain at Abergeldie, where they received the Duke of Connaught at dinner last week. The Prince on Saturday was present at a grand grouse drive on Invercauld Moor given by Col. Farquharson, when over seventy brace of grouse were bagged, besides hares and other game. On Tuesday the Prince and Princess gave a picnic at Loch Merrick, the Prince driving over to Ballater to meet his guests. Prince Leopold dined with the Prince and Princess on Tuesday. The Princess's eldest brother, the Crown Prince of Denmark, with his wife will shortly come to England on a visit to the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Prince of Wales has promised to present an annual prize to the students at Snettisham Grammar School, which is close to Sandringham.

The Duke of Edinburgh will shortly rejoin the British Fleet in Besika Bay. At present he has gone to Marseilles in the Sultan, to meet the Duchess, and will escort her in the Osborne to Malta, whence he will return to the East.—Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne arrived at Inverary on Saturday, and are now staying with the Duke of Argyle.—The Duke of Connaught is on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Breadalbane at Taymouth Castle, and will remain there for a week. He arrived on Saturday, and was warmly welcomed at the village of Aberfeldy.—Before returning to Balmoral last week, Prince Leopold visited the Tay Bridge, driving half-way across and being shown the details of the structure. The Prince was also presented with an album of photographs of the bridge.

The Duke of Cambridge has been staying with Lord and Lady Londesborough at Scarborough, and returned to town on Saturday.—The ex-Empress Eugénie and Prince Louis Napoleon left the Isle of Wight for Chiselhurst on Monday.—The Queen of Sweden's health is still so delicate that she has returned to Heidelberg for the winter.—The Emperor of Germany has joined the Empress at Baden-Baden to spend her birthday there.

CHURCH NEWS

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.——The seventeenth annual Church Congress will commence on Tuesday next at Croydon, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The meetings will be held in a temporary wooden building which has been erected for the purpose, and which, besides a Congress Hall capable of seating 4,000 persons, contains private apartments for his Grace, and for the Committee. Special services and daily "celebrations" will be held in several of the churches during the Congress week, the list of preachers including the Bishops of Oxford, Dover, Rochester, Argyll, and Derry, Archdeacon Emery, Canons Farrar and Carter, Professor Lightfoot, and the Revs. W. Knox-Little and R. W. Randall. An Ecclesiastical Art Exhibition will be held during the Congress. The Guardian, commenting on Archdeacon Denison's letter which we printed last week, says:—"While we cannot concur in his sweeping condemnation of all Church Congresses, because we believe that they have had an important function, and have fulfilled it fairly enough, still we are inclined to see in it a somewhat vehement expression of feeling, which we believe to be growing every day." The Guardian goes on to say that its own feeling lies midway between the gloomy forebodings of the Archdeacon and the cheerful anticipations of "a Westminster Rector," in The Times. It looks forward, however, with some anxiety to the Congress, "lest it should throw a spark into the combustible materials, which are only too ready to hand, and make much smoke, even if it kindles but little fire. It regards it as of special importance, "as being virtually the first London Congress, as being held under the presidency of the Primate, and as meeting at a time peculiarly critical;" and "trusts that it will prove itself worthy of the occasion, in the interest of its topics, the ability of its speakers, and most of all in the temper of mutual consideration and sense of brotherhood, which is indeed one of the rudiments of Christian life, but is, like all elementary principles, most difficult adequately to grasp and exhibit in the living reality."

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCH.——The Bishop of Carlisle, preaching at Bonners, Windermere, on Friday, in aid of the Carlisle Diocesan Church Extension Society, said that the noblest and best way of guarding against future mischief was to prove that they were equal to the position in which God had placed them, and to make the constantly increasing means of grace supplied by their means to be felt to be a blessing by the people of England. Every new church built, every old church restored, every new parsonage, every new endowment, was an additional support to the Church of England as a national Church. Some people were apt to look upon the Church as a beleaguered city, and to consider that the greater her possessions, the greater would be the desire of her enemies to seize upon her as booty and divide the spoil. The nation was no more likely to act upon this coarse and vulgar view than she was to adopt the somewhat kindred notion of applying Communistic principles to property in general. It would be the work which the Church was doing which would be the best pledge that the State would leave her civil condition untouched. Of course spiritual work would be the great thing; still, such work as that which the Diocesan Church Extension Society took in hand was the material machinery of the spiritual, and had the advantage of being palpable and visible to common eyes.—The Bishop of Durham, speaking at the re-opening of the parish church of Penshaw, said that the real danger of the Church was not from dissent; the most fearful and alarming feature of the present day was that the English Church Union—representing as it does such a large number of the clergy and laity—should with almost one voice, and with very few remonstrants, advocate and support the proceedings of Mr. Tooth in his open defiance of the law. If anything would pull down the Church of England it would be the defiance of the law by her ministers. "The people of England are a law-loving people; they are told by their clergy that they are to obey the law; and when they see the clergy themselves in so many instances openly defying the law, and declaring that the legal decisions are in no way binding upon them—determined, in fact, that what they wish and what they resolve is to be the law to them—the moment that this is felt by the laity to be the general opinion (and I fear that at this moment that feeling is extending), then it seems to me that our Church will lose the confidence of the laity of this country. No one can object to any persons being discontented with the law and seeking to change it; but it is one thing to say 'The law is bad, and we will strive after its improvement,' and a very different thing to say, 'The law is bad, therefore, to set an example of disobedience to the law, I will defy it, and say it has no authority with me.'"

The Proposed Popish Hierarchy for Scotland.——The Committee of the Scottish Reformation Society has issued a series of resolutions, calling attention to this "offensive proposal" now entertained at the Vatican, which it looks upon with dread, as "fraught with the greatest danger, alike to the sovereign prerogatives of the Crown and to the civil and religious liberties of the people." It therefore calls upon "all sound Protestants to employ every constitutional means to arrest the progress of this great evil, by discountenancing in every aspect the whole system of Romanism, by adopting measures to have all public support of it entirely withdrawn, and by raising their protest against the bold and defiant proposal," and earnestly urges "all ministers of the Gospel to warn their people of the dangers which now threaten the Protestant Churches, and to take every opportunity of instructing them, especially the young, in the great fundamental distinctions between the Gospel of the Grace of God and the ruinous errors of that system which the Scriptures denounce as the Man of Sin and Son of Perdition; the unchanging enemy of Christ, the only Saviour of the lost, and the only Mediator between God and man."

Various.——The Ridsdale Judgment was this week discussed at the meeting of the Bath and Wells Diocesan Conference. It occupied the principal part of the Bishop's opening address, and the Rev. A. Mahon proposed a motion approving of the decision. Archdeacon Denison, however, spoke of it as the biggest judicial falsification on record. Several amendments were proposed, and eventually it was decided that the Conference should abstain from either approval or disapproval of the judgment. The Conference then turned to the Burials Question, and adopted a declaration that "it was inexpedient that other than clergymen of the Church of England should be allowed to officiate in the churchyards."—On Tuesday a conference was held in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, on the subject of religious services in theatres, music halls, and mission rooms. Favourable reports were given by the missionaries of the various districts, and a letter from Lord Shaftesbury was read, in which he said that they had done much for the religious welfare of London, and that it would be a source of grief and shame if they were given up, or even reduced.—The Edinburgh West End Theatre has been purchased by the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, with the intention of turning it into a Synod House.—Dr. Moriarty, Roman Catholic Bishop of Kerry, died at Killarney on Monday last, having had an attack of paralysis on Saturday while consecrating the chapel attached to the Earl of Kenmare's new mansion. He was remarkable for his hostility to popular politics, and for many years was held in extreme disfavour for his denunciations of the leaders of Fenianism, of whom he is reported to have said on one occasion that "hell was not hot enough nor eternity long enough to give adequate punishment for the manner in which they had misled their countrymen."

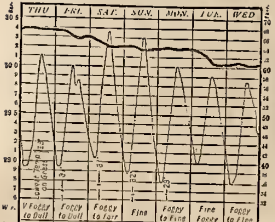
September 27th to October 3rd (inclusive)



Explanation.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——The weather during this week has been exceedingly quiet. Pressure has oscillated very little, the general tendency during the whole of the period being to decrease slowly, the highest point reached having been recorded on the first, and the lowest on the last of the days shown above. For nearly the whole period we have been lying under the influence of an anti-cyclone, or area of high pressure, and, as a consequence, very light variable airs have prevailed over the south-east of England, while in London itself calms have been reported at a great majority of the observatories. Temperature, unlike pressure, has had a considerable range, the maximum readings reaching or exceeding 60° on most days, while the minima in the night have been as low as 39°, 38°, and even 36°, the thermometer on the grass falling to the freezing point on Sunday, the 30th ultimo, to one degree below on Friday and Saturday, the 28th and 29th, and to three degrees on Monday, the 1st instant. Weather has been very dry, and the sky has been generally free from clouds; but a great deal of fog (which has not been confined to London, but been general over the whole country) has prevailed during the whole time. The barometer was highest (30·40 inches) at eight a.m. on Thursday, the 27th ultimo; lowest (30·00 inches) on Wednesday evening, the 3rd instant; range, 0·4 inches. The thermometer was highest (67°) on Saturday, the 29th ultimo; lowest (36°) on Monday and Wednesday, the 1st and 3rd instant; range, 31°. No rain has fallen.

A Mischievous Trick was played at the Brighton Aquarium on Sunday evening. One of the electric eels was taken by some person out of the central tank and was placed in the alligator pond, while four baby turtles were stolen from their home. The thief seized his opportunity during the temporary absence of the attendant between 5 and 7 P.M., when there are generally few visitors at the Aquarium, and has not yet been discovered.

Music

Mdlle. Titiens, whose painful illness has caused great anxiety amongst her friends for many months past, died on Wednesday morning at her residence in St. John's Wood at the age of forty-six. We will reserve any detailed biography and our remarks on her great musical talents and achievements until next week, when we hope to publish her portrait, but we may here utter a few words of deep and heartfelt sorrow at the premature loss of one of the greatest musical artists England has ever known. We say England advisedly, for although of Hungarian origin, and German by birth—Hamburg being her native city—Mdlle. Titiens, apart from her operatic personations, has so identified herself with English oratorios, and both London and provincial "Festival" performances for all but twenty years, that she had come to be looked upon as an Englishwoman born and bred. Her popularity with the public in general was probably greater than that of her compeers, while in musical circles her geniality and kindheartedness to all, and in particular to young beginners and amateurs, caused her to be universally beloved. Her end was sudden, but peaceful. After dinner on Tuesday Mdlle. Titiens complained of feeling faint and went to bed, and slept for awhile. In the early morning, however, serious symptoms set in, and she died at two A.M. She had appeared singularly cheerful during the evening, and had been highly gratified by a message through Sir Spencer Wells from Her Majesty, expressing sympathy with her sufferings and admiration of her talent. Truly, no mark of Royal sympathy has ever been more deservedly bestowed than those few kind words which cheered the last hours of Theresa Titiens.

Crystal Palace Concerts.——The 22nd series of these admirable entertainments begins to-day, with a programme full of attraction, among the leading features being Mr. Arthur Sullivan's incidental music to Henry VIII., the overture to Le Prémier Jour de Bonheur (Auber's penultimate opera), and, last not least, Sir Julius Benedict's concerto in E flat, for pianoforte and orchestra, the pianoforte part sustained—not for the first time, even at the Crystal Palace—by Madame Arabella Goddard. The overture to Oberon and the C major symphony of Beethoven are also comprised. The Crystal Palace Choir is to assist in the performance of Mr. Sullivan's characteristic music. With reference to one point, it may be urged that, while so many fine symphonies by Haydn have not hitherto been accorded a hearing at these concerts, where the "Father of the Symphony," nevertheless, obtains such earnest and sympathetic attention from Mr. August Manns, Beethoven's earliest work of the kind might, with advantage to itself, be granted a somewhat longer period of repose. So bright and masterly a piece, however, cannot fail, under any circumstances, to be more or less welcome, and few except such amateurs as have been accustomed to hear it at frequent intervals during many years past will feel inclined to object. Its other points of interest borne in mind, Mr. Manns may therefore be congratulated on having prepared a model selection for his habitual supporters. The prospectus for the season, which is to terminate on the 15th of May, looks well upon paper; and the Crystal Palace directors, it must be admitted, usually adhere with conscientious strictness to the pledges set forth in their preliminary announcements. There are to be eleven concerts before, and fourteen after Christmas. The orchestra remains much as previously, with Mr. Manns in the place he has so zealously filled from the outset. Any change in these departments would be viewed with considerable dissatisfaction. Last season the Crystal Palace choral singers exhibited signs of progress which were heartily recognised on more than one occasion; and it is to be hoped they may continue to advance steadily in the same path, though some are of opinion that they would do wisely to turn their backs upon oratorio, unless when assuming the shape of some very interesting novelty; such, for example, as the "sacred drama," Hezekiah, which Mr. J. L. Hatton, one of our most highly esteemed musicians, has lately finished. This forms an important item in the catalogue of works by English authors. Sterndale Bennett—as, to the credit of Mr. Manns, invariably happens—is well cared for. In addition to his beautiful cantata, The May Queen, one of his pianoforte concertos, and the music to his unfinished Ajax—the last he ever wrote, and on that account alone the most acceptable of all—are promised. Mr. Henry Gadsby's overture to Andromeda, and his choruses in Alcestis, together with a manuscript symphony in G minor by Mr. Ebenezer Prout, will be welcome—the last more especially as something unknown from the pen of a composer whose talent and scholarly requirements have won general recognition. A "new concert-overture," by Mr. C. V. Stanford, of Trinity College, Cambridge (the same that was performed at the recent Gloucester Festival) completes the list—unless we may translate into a certainty the "hope" entertained by the directors of being able to include Professor Macfarren's Lady of the Lake (his most recent production) of which reports from Glasgow warrant high expectations. For the great Scotch city the cantata was expressly written, and it is to be produced there at one of the Subscription Concerts in December next. This, added to Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Henry VIII. (above-mentioned) would to English compositions and English composers that fair share of publicity which, unquestionably their due, can rarely fail to be acceptable as it is desirable. That to Beethoven the Colossus is assigned a giant's place in the scheme may be taken for granted; and there was little necessity to urge any plea for so inevitable a decision. Mozart is called upon not only for two out of his many orchestral symphonies, but for a series of variations (horns and stringed instruments) not long since brought to light at Vienna, familiar enough to enthusiastic lovers of the Salzburg genius, however unfamiliar to amateurs and musicians in general. Only two symphonies by Haydn—the 9th of the "Salomon" set, and "that in G, quaintly" (why quaintly?) "known as 'Letter V.'" Besides other compositions from Mendelssohn, a fugue for stringed instruments, belonging to one of his early symphonies, is set down. The more of such things the better, inasmuch as every fresh contribution acquaints us more nearly with the development of the genius of that exceptional musician to whom the Art-world is indebted for Elijah. Of Schubert we are to hear once more the curiously styled "Tragic Symphony," and which has nothing "tragic" in it, and first time, another symphony, in B flat, the second proceeding from the brain of Beethoven's most fertile and gifted contemporary. Two out of the four symphonies by Schumann are, as a matter of course, provided; and—mirabile dictu!—the ballet music from Rossini's Moïse, Parisian version of his Mosè in Egitto. The Introduction to Act 1, or the grand chorus of Act 2, from the same opera, would have conferred more honour upon the illustrious Pesarese. Our "elders" in art are not overlooked, and various compositions by Bach and Handel, about which it is needless to say more than that they are here comparatively unknown, are included. Not the least interesting among these is "The Yorkshire Feast Song," by our own Henry Purcell, which, though advertised last season, was non-forthcoming. The "Sinfonie Caracteristique" of Hector Berlioz, founded upon Byron's "Childe Harold," and entitled Harold en Italie, has been heard more than once in London, though never till now at the Crystal Palace. We are curious to witness the effect produced upon the Sydenham audience by this gloomy and magnificent "tone-poem," "tone-picture," or whichever the disciples of the "Romantic School" may delight to call it, and no less curious to be informed upon whom will devolve the task of playing the obbligato part for a single viola, supposed to represent the personage of Harold throughout the entire symphony. The Wald-sinfonie of Joachim Raff, the fourth "Orchestral Rhapsody" of Abbé Liszt (rhapsody indeed!), the symphony which Herr Anton Rubinstein boldly entitles Ocean, and orchestral pieces from Reinecke, Hoffman, Goldmark, and Saint Saens (the Wagner-idolising French critic and musician), together with Verdi's Requiem, the ballet music from Gounod's last opera, Cinq Mars, selections from Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen, &c., and Sir Michael Costa's serenata, The Dream, are all set down.

LEGAL

The Penge Murder.—The verdict in this terrible case appears to have produced a sudden and complete revulsion of public feeling. Up to the last day of the trial the general sympathy was undoubtedly on the side of the poor woman who had been so cruelly done to death; but no sooner had the verdict been delivered and the sentences pronounced than a perfect deluge of letters appear in the daily press, some blaming the judge for unfairness, others complaining of the insufficiency of the evidence as against one or all of the accused; and, again, others contending that no murder had been, or could possibly be proved in consistency with the medical evidence. Mr. Charles Reade considers that the whole proceedings are vitiated in consequence of a juryman's application for a copy of the indictment not having been complied with by the judge, and a legion of other amateur lawyers have put their various "opinions" into print. Petitions to the Home Office are being signed for a commutation of the sentences, and the suggestion has been made that the whole inquiry should be re-opened. Meanwhile the convicts lie in Maidstone Gaol, where (unless a reprieve is granted) they will be executed on Tuesday week, and the morbid curiosity of the public is fed by daily bulletins as to their demeanour, appetite, and occupation. They have been visited by several relatives, and they continue to protest their innocence, in which Mrs. Staunton, sen., has declared her firm belief. On Monday the Daily Telegraph contained a long statement made by Clara Brown giving the most revolting details of the treatment which she alleges the deceased received at the hands of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Staunton. It must be remembered, however, that this statement was not made on oath, that it is not merely supplementary of, but on some points differs materially from, the evidence which she gave at the trial, and that it comes through a "correspondent," who confesses that it was written from memory. This "correspondent," it appears, has had a second interview with the girl, and obtained from her an acknowledgment that his version is substantially correct, assigning as a reason for not having told more at the trial that she only answered the questions asked. On the other hand, Mr. Poole, one of the speakers at the meeting held at the Cannon Street Hotel on Wednesday, affirmed that he had seen Clara Brown, who denied some parts of it, and said that it was with great surprise that she saw all that was published in the Daily Telegraph. A still more astonishing statement is made by "an experienced reporter" in the Daily Telegraph of Wednesday, to the effect that "a police official" had told him that all the statements contained in Clara Brown's story as published on Monday, had been made to him months ago by the girl herself. If this be true, it seems remarkable that they should not have been communicated to the Treasury, or if communicated, that the allegations should not have been brought out during the girl's examination.

A Strange Affair.——Two men are now lying in the London Hospital suffering from wounds which each accuses the other of inflicting. Their names are Hill and Snelgrove, and it seems that they both lodged in the same house at Bethnal Green, and that there had been some disagreement between them. Snelgrove is a baker, and he states that being employed at night he was asleep on Friday last at about 3 P.M., when Hill made an attack upon him with a chisel, inflicting several wounds. He awoke, a struggle took place, and Hill, after throwing a kettle of water over him and snatching up a table-knife, ran away to his own room, where he was afterwards found, with his throat cut, by a policeman who was called in. Hill's statement, made at the hospital, is the very converse of this. It alleges that Snelgrove was the first assailant, Hill being asleep at the time, that Snelgrove ran away, and, being pursued into his own room, threw the kettle, and that Hill caught up the chisel in self-defence. Hill appeared perfectly sane until late on Saturday night, when he snatched a spoon from one of the nurses, and with it tried to reopen the wound in his throat. He is in a dangerous condition, but Snelgrove's wounds are not very severe.

Miscellaneous Items.—The man Herliby, who was arrested at Cork last week for having a large quantity of fire arms in his possession, has now been committed for trial. The arms are supposed to have been stolen last year from Messrs. Allports, in Patrick Street, by a man named John Walsh, who was then employed there. Some letters found at Herliby's house tend to show that this Walsh is now a soldier. In one dated from Aldershot he speaks of great preparations for war, hopes that the "widow's defenders will get licked," and that it will not be long before he is out of the "widow's livery." In another letter "the organisation" is alluded to, and reference is made to the funeral of "Colonel O'Mahony."—The Sheffield Independent says that a searching investigation is being made into a series of gigantic and astonishing frauds perpetrated upon one of our great railways; and that, before long, a full revelation of one of the most startling plots ever known in the history of railway enterprise may be expected.—The neighbourhood of Clapham is now receiving the unwelcome attentions of some members of the housebreaking fraternity, and the police have as yet been able to do nothing

They, however, expressed regret that the law did not better define gambling so as to cover cases of the kind.—At Newport (Isle of Wight) fines of 1s. and costs have been imposed upon two men for cruelty during a "duck hunt."—A man and woman, both very aged, have been committed for trial for forging a transfer of Bank of England belonging to the sister of the male prisoner.—The trial of Ann Johnson for the manslaughter of a child placed in her care took place at the Old Bailey on Saturday last. It was shown that the accused had five children of her own besides those which she took in to nurse, that only a pennyworth of milk per day was taken for them, that she was sometimes out all day, and they were then left in charge of a girl aged fifteen, who however was generally playing in the streets. The deceased child was very dirty and emaciated; but a medical man having declared that its condition might have been produced by disease, the judge (Mr. Justice Hawkins) ruled that no culpable neglect had been established, and under his direction the jury gave a verdict of not guilty.

TOOTH-ACHE.
INSTANT CURE.
FORMS A STOPPING.
SAVES THE TOOTH.
J. Hounsell, Esq., Surgeon, Bridport, writes:—"I consider Bunter's Nervine a specific for Toothache. Very severe cases under my care have found instantaneous and permanent relief."
Of chemists, 1s. 1½d. per packet.

DEAR VANITY.—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the enviable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. A first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed-for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.
TALON ROUGE,
Vanity Fair, March 17, 1877.
